It was hardly possible that under the late Colonial Secretary's scheme the increase in the price of a four pound loaf could be more than one-third of a farthing, so that the Liberals who went round with a big and a little loaf, telling people that if the Unionists got in that their poor little children would starve, were talking something worse than nonsense. It might be smart Party politics to try to humbug the working classes, and prevent them from inquiring into the great fiscal question, but surely it was not playing the game from a patriotic point of view. Even right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House must understand that the working man's weekly household expenses would not be any higher than they were under present conditions. Self-preservation was allowed to be the first law of nature, and was there very much difference between self-preservation and self-protection. A German Socialist Member, speaking a short time ago in the German Parliament, said, "For goodness sake don't irritate the British, or you will help Mr. Chamberlain." A German Minister quite lately refused to settle a commercial affair with Italy because, he said, they must have their hands free till they saw what Great Britain was going to do, and that his opinion was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would get his way because his policy was undoubtedly the best for the British Empire. In America the other day, at a meeting of the leaders of commerce, it was strongly urged that America ought at once to offer Canada the best possible commercial terms before the patriotism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had time to bind her commercially to the British Empire for ever. Practically all the rest of the civilised nations believed in preserving their own industries. Were the small and decreasing number of free importers in these islands quite sure that they were the only wise ones. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." In the policy of the ex-Colonial Secretary there was hope, hope for these islands, hope for the colonies. There was also hope for every working son and daughter of the Empire, hope, and good hope, that old-age pensions might be found for those who had done their work in this country. But there was no hope, none for their policy, except for the lotus eaters, who wanted to sleep, and for the foreign members of the Cobden Club. How was it that these hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the other side could not understand? Was it that their policy was so poor and so stagnant, so unlike what should be the policy of a great progressive Party, that they were afraid to change even after fifty years? Were they so tied hand and foot by fossilised theories of more than half-a-century ago that they would not even allow themselves to try to understand; or could it be that the spirit of the mighty Cobden had heard in some far-off star that his prophecies had been proved to be utterly false, that his policy had been challenged, and that his spirit had come back to hypnotise and mesmerise their judgment, and mesmerising their brains. In conclusion, might he remind them of an ancient prophecy that did come true? Seated under one of England's mighty oaks rested the Chief of the Druids, and to him came Boadicea, Britain's warrior Queen, bleeding from the Roman rods. The Druid, after foretelling the utter ruin and destruction of the Roman empire, prophesied that—

> "Then the progeny that springs
> From the forests of our land,
> Clad with thunder, armed with wings,
> Shall a wider world command,
> Regions Cæsar never knew
> Thy posterity shall sway."

Those regions, that inheritance, was ours to-day, won in bygone years by the courage and endurance of our gallant grandsires. The sons and daughters of Britain in those vast continents had, through their representatives and the ex-Colonial Secretary, asked us whether we could not find a way of uniting the British Empire commercially as well as by ties of sympathy. This might be the last time they would have a chance of deciding it. What would future generations say of the present leaders of the people if they allowed the inhabitants of these islands to lose their great inheritance, frightened by the bogey of the big loaf, and coerced by the pro-Boer and the Little Englander?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): After the interesting speech to which we have just listened I am sorry that in the flattering tale of hope which the hon. Member has given us he has not left one solitary ray for those who sit on this side of the House. Our doom is already fixed and our end is certain. But I was somewhat pleased to hear somebody standing up for the ex-Colonial Secretary. I felt that after last night the ex-Colonial Secretary had been apparently—I use that word advisedly—deserted by some whom he might have regarded as his friends; and I wondered whether that speech, to which we listened with so much interest, would have been delivered if he had been sitting in his accustomed place, and I wondered still more what the reply would have been, and what criticism he would have passed on that speech. But I would like, before I go more generally into the whole question, to say one word with reference to what I think of the comments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol upon my right hon. friend the Member for the Montrose Burghs. He took exception to his having refused the suggestion which had been made some few days ago. The right hon. Gentleman complained that we had inexplicably mixed up this Amendment with a question of confidence in the Ministry. Now, who was the cause of that? Who propounded the doctrine last year—or rather who announced the decision that there should be no discussion on this question except in the shape of a vote of censure? We understood the reason perfectly well. If there had been a vote of censure proposed last year before Parliament broke up, if we had had no statistics presented to us, and if the authors of the great change had not announced their rival policies, we should have been challenged at once with the statement that we did not know anything of what they meant to propose, and that we were simply censuring the Government without having a single fact before us on which to justify that censure. But in this session we are in a totally different position. We have had all the statistics, the Board of Trade Report on the celebrated inquiry. We have your two policies, or your policy—I do not know whether to call it in the singular or the plural number. We have had two policies brought before us. We have had Cabinet divisions. We have had the Cabinet broken up, and perhaps I may say in passing that, at all events so far as the House of Commons is concerned, we have had no statement made to us of the reason why so many Cabinet Ministers—four of the first rank and highest ability—have left His Majesty's Government. I have no doubt that omission will be rectified before this debate is over, but whatever may have appeared in the public Press, whatever may have appeared in letters, statements, or speeches, I take it to be undoubted that hitherto the faithfully followed constitutional rule has been that no Cabinet Minister should resign without telling Parliament why he had done so, and also giving an opportunity to justify the reasons which compelled him to resign.

Now irrespective of that, we have had the country, during last autumn, I may say convulsed with an unprecedented controversy. There has been no parallel to this controversy which has so affected every section of the community—I might almost say every man in the land—at all events for two generations. We have had a policy propounded by the Member for West Birmingham, and we have had a policy propounded at different times and under different circumstances by the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol has come to the rescue, and the situation, he says, is a political situation. I do not want to use a phrase which has been used already in this debate, and to say that, it is a paltry manœuvre, but it is a very clever manœuvre. It is a clever manœuvre for the moment to pass over certain essential features which I shall try to show to the House are inseparable from the Government policy in order to secure what the right hon. Gentleman himself characterised as a mere Party division. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech, after criticising the wording of my right hon. friend's Amendment, admitted that there had been conflicting declarations from His Majesty's Ministers, which, after all, is just the foundation of our complaint against those Ministers. Purged as they have been, they are still not agreed. The right hon. Gentleman went further. He not only admitted that, but he admitted that there were a great many just now who agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham who ought to have followed him into the wilderness and with his self-denial preached the doctrine which he had propounded to the country. Then having clearly shown his complete dissent from all the proceedings and policy which have been propounded in Birmingham and elsewhere, he went through the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and extracted from that speech several distinct statements. He dealt with the proposals of the Member for West Birmingham as opposed by the President of the Board of Trade item by item. Colonial preference, he said, had been abandoned, taxation of food was dismissed; the 10 per cent. duty was also sent into limbo. The only policy that remained was retaliation, to which the Member for West Bristol himself had never objected. He went so far as to say that the result of the speech which we heard last night was a pledge—a definite pledge—on the if they won at the general election—even if they obtained a majority—they would not be entitled to carry out a policy of colonial preference.

Well, what has all the talk been about? Colonial preference is the foundation of the whole scheme. That has been trumpeted from every platform. That has been advocated by every mode of illustration and every kind of argument. The Empire according to the Birmingham programme is dropping to pieces. We have arrived face to face with a gigantic calamity. The unity of the Empire is being detroyed; and unless it is remedied at once, then that great catastrophe, which was prognosticated a hundred years ago by Cowper, in the poem read by the hon. Member about Boadicea and the Druid under the Oak—that prophecy is about to be fulfilled! But the right hon. Gentleman went a little further. He would not have been quite true to his Party if he had not taken another step; he said that there was another reason, that there was another flag to be waved—something above and beyond all fiscal questions, all commercial questions. He said that he would not, under any circumstances—he swept the whole political horizon—desire to replace His Majesty's Government by the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. [An HON. MEMBER on the MINISTERIAL Benches: Hear, hear!] I am delighted to hear that cheer, but it is rather a cheap sneer under all the circumstances of the case to say that among all the subjects of His Majesty in either House of Parliament there is nobody capable of administering the affairs of the country; nobody who could carry on either its home or domestic policy, and that like a great general—someone at the time of a revolution who was constituted a Dictator—those Gentlemen, Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench, and they alone, can stand between this British Empire and its utter downfall. That, however, we expect; but I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should so openly and so unqualifiedly have put his Party above his country. Well, it is good Party fighting; that I admit. But I have to say a word on the conclusions at which the right hon. Gentleman has arrived, and upon the history on which those conclusions are based. If we accept what would satisfy him, the assurance of the President of the Board of Trade, as the very last word upon the Government policy, we should confuse our intellects and obliterate all our memories. What were the resignations for? Why did they resign? Three distinguished men who were Members of this House expressed their intention, their willingness, to support a retaliatory policy to which they made no objection. Why did they resign? What did they go out for? I will ask the House to consider a few dates on that transaction, in order that we may show whether there is, or ever has been, any real or substantial difference between the policy of the Prime Minister, as propounded by the President of the Board of Trade, and the policy of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. No information has been given to us in this House, and we must piece it up from the Press, and from what we have picked up from some of the speeches which have been made. The fact seems to be that there was a considerable difference of opinion from the time of the Budget, and the Cabinet was on the point of breaking up in the month of April on the question of free trade and protection. On the last day of last session two documents were placed before the Cabinet. The noble Lord the Member for Ealing, whom I am glad to see in his place, and who I hope will take an early opportunity of addressing the House, said—

> "On the last day of the session the Cabinet met, and we had before us two documents—a pamphlet entitled 'Insular Free Trade,' and another document containing the proposals of the Prime Minister, which he wished officially to put forward in the name of the Government. And"

says the noble Lord—

> "Preferential tariffs and taxation of food were included in that programme."

Last night we were told that that was not the policy of the Government; that it was not in their programme. Well, the noble Lord said that in the discussion they differed. That was natural enough; the Cabinet differed; and they accepted the first pamphlet on "Insular Free Trade." There was nothing to object to in the circulation of that clever and ingenious document—

"But we differed as to the second. The discussion was adjourned, and on the 14th September the discussion was resumed."

Therefore we may gather from that that between the two dates the Cabinet did not meet again to discuss the question. But in the interval an interesting correspondence took place. On 9th September the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham wrote his celebrated letter to the Prime Minister, and it was written in contemplation of the Cabinet that was to take place on the 14th. The right hon. Gentleman with great frankness—for he is always frank—and great clearness, put before the Prime Minister the distinct difficulites which faced him with reference to some parts of his programme and also the policy which he thought the Government should pursue. And then he said—

"Accordingly I suggest."

—Suggestion comes from Birmingham—

"That you should limit the present policy of the Government to the assertion of our freedom in the case of all commercial relations with foreign countries, and that you should agree to my tendering my resignation of my present office to His Majesty, and devoting myself to the work of explaining and popularising both these principles of Imperial unity which my experience has convinced me are essential to our welfare and prosperity."

Well, the Prime Minister did not reply until the 16th. But two ominous Cabinets intervened between these dates. I go back to the statement of the noble Lord. He says that when they met and when the Cabinet was over, at which they were unable to agree—

"The Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Ritchie and Lord Balfour of Burleigh and I met in my room. We fully discussed the situation as we understood it, and we were unanimously of opinion that we had no option but to resign."

Well, those distinguished men did not resign at that time on retaliation. There was something much more serious than that which took them out of the Government. Well the next day they had another meeting and nothing came of that?

"We four met again, and as I was informed there was no change in the situation, I formally sent in my resignation."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon and the Secretary for Scotland did the same. Then after that break up of the Government—for it was a break up of the Government—on the 16th, and not till then, the Prime Minister answers the letter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Everybody can see that, as is stated, the reply was a formal one, embodying the results of the conversations which had taken place in the meantime, and nothing new is added. "Agreeing as I do with you," says the Prime Minister, "that the time had come when a change should be made in the fiscal canons by which we should bind ourselves in our dealings with other countries, it seems paradoxical that you should leave the Cabinet at a time when others of my colleagues are leaving it who disagree on the very point in hand. It is astonishing that you, a protectionist, should leave the Cabinet when the free traders have left it! Then," says the Prime Minister, "if there ever has been any difference between us in connection with this matter, it has only been with regard to the practicability of a proposal which would seem to require on the part of the Colonies a limitation in the all-round development of the protective policy, and on the part of this country the establishment of a preference in favour of imported Colonial products. On the first of these requirements I say nothing; but if the second involves, as it certainly does, taxation, however light, upon foodstuffs, I am convinced with you that public opinion is not yet ripe." This, mind you, is a great national policy, involving the destruction of a system which has been in force in this country, accepted by Parliament, by general elections, by popular opinion, and ratified by the unparalleled prosperity which has extended over half a century, and this question is to be dealt with as if it were some trumpery Departmental Bill, which at the end of the session is described as uncontroversial; as if it were a matter for educating the general public to approach without shying. When Sir R. Peel came to the conclusion, in a protectionist Cabinet, that it was in the interests and for the salvation of the country that the protectionist policy should cease, he told his colleagues so, and he had only three men in that Cabinet who supported him. They were Lord Aberdeen, Sir James Graham, and the late Lord Herbert of Lea. The rest of the Cabinet were against him, and they did as Cabinets have done before, I suppose, and will do again—they asked for further time to consider and to inquire. That inquiry went on; a certain interval elapsed, and when the Cabinet met again the numbers had rather changed. A considerable number had come round to Sir R. Peel; but in the end two members of the Cabinet—one of them a Minister of the highest rank, the late Lord Derby—declined to assent to the proposal. What did Sir R. Peel do? He felt at once that he could not propose to Parliament a policy in those circumstances, as he had not the unanimous support of the Cabinet; and he resigned. The Queen sent for Lord John Russell, who tried to form a Cabinet. He found, however, that he was incapable of forming a Government. I think he was about a fortnight in trying to form a Government, and then gave it up in despair, and told the Queen that he could not form a Government. Sir Robert Peel went down to Windsor to resign the seals of his office. The first remark Her Majesty made to him was—

> "I am not going to accept your resignation; I want you to continue in my service."

She told him what had passed between herself and Lord John Russell, with which, to a certain extent, he was acquainted, and when the Queen suggested that he should consult his colleagues, he said he was prepared at once to take upon himself the responsibility of serving the Crown under these circumstances of difficulty, and he asked that he might kiss hands and go back to London as Prime Minister. What did he do when he came back? He called his colleagues together and that very evening he told them he was determined to propose his policy, whether his colleagues went with him or not, and that he should form a Government. That resulted in the resignation of Lord Derby and another member of the Cabinet. That was the way in which a great statesman approached a great controversy of great importance to the country. It showed, first, that he would not attempt to go on with a divided Cabinet, and, secondly, that the Opposition must have some opportunity of showing whether they could carry the reform. If they would not do that, then he was prepared to place the whole of his talents and abilities at the service of the Crown, whether his colleagues agreed with him or not. I think that is a precedent which might have been followed in the present situation. I will now go back to one or two more dates. The noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman resigned. But what was the position of the Duke of Devonshire at that moment? On 1st October we had the great meeting at Sheffield——

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): "Hear, hear!"

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Held, most appropriately, in the constituency of the hon. and gallant Member—Si monumentum quoeris circumspice. The Duke of Devonshire had been rather doubtful as to his position, still clinging to the possibility of a policy of retaliation and nothing else. But the next morning, when he read the Sheffield speech, he sent in his resignation. It was perfectly clear to him what the position of the Government was. He did not leave them on the ground of that which they now propound as their policy. He left them because he saw clearly and distinctly that that was but the commencement of a policy of protection, and that the Sheffield speech was a mere makeshift for electioneering and Party purposes, and to prevent, as the Prime Minister frankly said in his speech, the breaking-up of the great Unionist Party. I do not find fault with the Leader of that Party, I do not find fault with right hon. Gentlemen opposite, in doing what they could to prevent the breaking-up of their Party. I am one of those who believe that Parliamentary Government means Party Government, and that there is no greater danger and menace to the political system and constitution of this country than the formation of separate groups similar to those which exist in the French Chamber. The right hon. Gentleman did his best to prevent that catastrophe, and no one could find fault with him. But after that the mission began. The missionary went forth, and we had a succession of clever, able speeches, most popular, received with great enthusiasm, in large centres. I am not going to belittle the talents or the abilities of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. But what was the Government doing all this time? Was there any voice ever went forth from them that they differed in any way from his policy, that they dissented from what he was doing? Was there anything even approaching to what the right hon. Gentleman himself said at Bristol, and to what he said last night? On the contrary. Let me recall to the memory of the House what the colleagues of the Prime Minister were doing all this time. Was there a speech made by a colleague of the Prime Minister in which they did not, while, of course, accepting the formula of "freedom of negotiation"—that was the pet phrase then—express one after another their enthusiasm for the proposals of the Member for West Birmingham, and their intention to support them when it was safe to do so? I will say that among the most outspoken and straightforward of those utterances were those of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. What did he say? He said—

> "He had no difficulty or hesitation in stating his own views as a member of the Government. He accepted, endorsed, and followed the policy of the Prime Minister, but he did not pretend for one moment that he did not believe, as he had always believed, that ultimately the policy which Mr. Chamberlain had been advancing with such marvellous ability and such wonderful success would have to be adopted by the people of this country."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] Reconcile those cheers with the speech of last night. Let me take another very outspoken member of the Government, the Postmaster-General. He said—

> "Supposing at the next general election Mr. Chamberlain's proposals carried the field? He should be prepared then, as he was now, to follow absolutely and implicitly, in all the general, well-established principles of the Party to which he belonged. But it would probably have to be not as a member of the Government, but as a private Member, because he should have to reserve to himself the right to vote against any part of the proposals."

There was another distinguished Member. I regard him, without excessive compliment, or in any way wishing to flatter, as among the most distinguished members of the present Government—a rising statesman of whom, I think, the House is proud, and for whom we may look forward to a brilliant future. I mean the noble Lord the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. What does he say?

> "Two distinct"— an acute intellect the noble Lord has—

> "but not incompatible policies"—

why, the whole speech of the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for West Bristol is blown to the winds if you accept that description—

> "had been put forward by the Government and by Mr. Chamberlain, and Members of Parliament had been compelled to descend from the fence. There could be no doubt that when a general election came, he did not see why it should come for a long time"— it is a deep-rooted conviction of His Majesty's Ministers that a general election should not come for a long time—

> "Mr. Chamberlain's policy would be completely realised, and that the question which would be put before the electorate would be the question of tariff reform."

I think the noble Lord gave us a still more interesting, what shall I say, relation of his own personal opinion, worthy of note, especially after his interpolation last night about methods and object. The House will remember the implicit, the child-like confidence with which the noble Lord said he did "not ask to see the distant scene, one step enough for him." Last night he said he did not differ from the object, but from the methods. One step enough for him. Yes, but he knew where he was starting from and where he was going to. He knew where that step was to end, that it was to be followed by other steps, and if he did not know that, if he did not mean that, he would not have taken even the first step. The policy was clear and distinct. I do not think any policy has been more clearly put forward in our time, notwithstanding the mystification and muddle with which it has been environed. The Government mean, if they can, to carry out the policy of the Member for West Birmingham. They believe it to be the best policy for the Government, they believe it to be the best policy for the country, and they believe it to be the best policy for the Conservative Party. I do not hear hon. Gentlemen opposite cheering that remark. A wonderful change has come over the scene. The ceaseless cheering with which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has always been greeted in this House and out of it since these proposals were produced is now hushed into silence. Ah, there has been another mission abroad besides the West Birmingham mission. There has been the mission of the by-elections, and I know few sermons that have produced such marvellous results on the convictions, and no doubt on the votes, of hon. Gentleman opposite as that significant writing on the wall.

AN HON. MEMBER: Only one.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Only one! Twenty-six since the policy was propounded, and of those twenty-six, at the time of the general election, you had a majority of fourteen, and to-day we have a majority of two. That is a sound, straightforward fact not an illustration. And what is the policy of the Conservative Party in the provinces? What is the policy which is attempting to break up the Unionist Party, to capture the organisation of the Unionist Party? Why, to support the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I doubt whether any Conservative candidate would have a chance in any strong Conservative constituency unless he was prepared to use that shibboleth. Does the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board doubt that?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. WALTER LONG, Bristol, S.): I did not wish to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman. Perhaps I spoke too loudly to my right hon. friend. I was saying to him that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be altogether inconsistent with what he had just said. The right hon. Gentleman said a moment ago that a change had come over the spirit of our dream, and that the policy of the Member for Birmingham was very unpopular with our friends. He now says the whole Conservative Party will have nothing but the right hon. Gentleman.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: I am very glad of the interruption. I rather invited it. I never doubted the position of the Conservative Party. I said it was not popular with the country. That is the question which we have still got to settle. That is the one tribunal that you do not want to go to. That is the one thing you are united about beyond all question. When some one attacked Lord Melbourne on the distracted and divided councils of his Ministry and the position they were cutting in Parliament and in the country, and remonstrated with him upon them, he said—

> "There is one question on which we are all united."

He was asked what that was, and he replied—

> "We do not mean to go out."

Passing away from the history of the autumn, I come to what I must call the extraordinary speech of the President of the Board of Trade—a speech which won the vote and secured the approval of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. The right hon. Gentleman said that the President of the Board of Trade threw overboard the whole policy of the Member for West Birmingham. I do not think he did. He drew a very singular distinction as he went on between his individual opinion and his opinion as a member of the Government. We all respect him, and I have the profoundest respect for him personally and also on account of his talent. But I venture to say that the Minister of Commerce, the Minister of Trade in this country, so long as he holds the office of President of the Board of Trade, is not authorised to express in any shape or form in this House his individual opinion on matters so vitally affecting one trade. He must speak and can speak only as the Minister of Commerce. He was perfectly frank with the House, but when you strip from his statement last night what was the individual opinion to which he did not pledge the Government, and the opinion which he expressed as President of the Board of Trade, you will see there is a very wide distinction. Among the Members of the Government who have expressed their full concurrence, not only with the policy of the Member for West Birmingham, but with the policy of protection, unashamed and naked protection, is the Secretary to the Board of Trade. But where the President of the Board of Trade, as I think, is not entitled to have two separate opinions, one as President and one as an individual, I am quite sure that the Board of Trade ought not to speak with two voices. I am quite sure that the well-understood constitutional discipline of Government in this country does not leave it open to any Minister who is not a responsible member of the Cabinet to differ in this House from the policy of his chief.

I now come to the policy which the right hon. Gentleman put before the House—the policy of power to negotiate. Well, Sir, the Government have got that power; no Act of Parliament is necessary to give it to them. Are the legal advisers of the Crown going to bring in a Bill whereby it is to be enacted that His Majesty's Ministers are to have power to negotiate treaties with foreign countries? No. But you will observe that the point upon which you could not pin the President of the Board of Trade last night, was as to the power of Parliament in this matter. He said, of course, that no taxation should be imposed in this country without the consent of Parliament. That we know pretty well. Then he was asked whether his contention was that the consent of Parliament should be given in each individual case, and he was not at liberty to say—the Cabinet had not determined upon that. What does that amount to? Did it amount to a suggestion that the Crown might negotiate treaties involving taxation? I do not wish to carry that point any further than is fair and just to the right hon. Gentleman, but that point is not cleared up. Some responsible member of the Government must make it clear—some member of the Cabinet who has authority to say—what the Prime Minister really means about the power of Parliament. We have had a precedent quoted over and over again in these debates—the precedent of the French treaty. How was that done? Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Cobden negotiated with the French Government month after month, and all the way through it was understood that these negotiations were to be subject to the decision of Parliament. And what happened? On the first night of that session the representative of the Foreign Minister laid the treaty upon the Table of this House, and then Mr. Gladstone announced that he would take the earliest opportunity of asking the judgment of the House upon it, and that no further step could be taken—he would not bring in his Budget nor deal with taxation in any shape or form—until the House had discussed and sanctioned that Bill. What was the difficulty in doing that? The House, by an enormous majority, expressed their approval of that treaty, and gave the Crown full power to negotiate that specific treaty. The Crown had power to negotiate treaties, but Mr. Gladstone asked the House to sanction that specific arrangement, and the House did so. I am inclined to think there must be something behind—something which it is intended to remove from the purview and power of the House of Commons. So much for retaliation.

My right hon. friend the Member for Berwickshire asked in one of his trenchant speeches during the recess—

> "On whom are you going to retaliate; on what are you going to retaliate; and how are going to retaliate?"

We have not had one line, one syllable, to illumine us on that question. They say, "We want to put down 'dumping.'" You will be very clever if you can put down "dumping," if "dumping" means selling things below their cost price in competition with fair trade. There is a great deal of "dumping" done at home, and so there will be as long as men fail, as long as men have difficulties, as long as they have to go to their bankers, as long as they have to realise their stocks by selling them at far below cost. You cannot put a stop to an Englishman exporting, if he chooses to do so, goods at a less price than it cost him to make them, if he can get a market for them abroad. There is "dumping" which is very beneficial and ought not to be interfered with; there is "dumping" which supplies a large portion of our raw material. While I was in Scotland the other day I met a large manufacturer there, and was talking to him about "dumping." He told me this—

> "I had an order to make some steel tubes for New York—for an American house. I could not tender for those tubes if I bought my steel either in England or in Scotland. I tried Germany and I could not do it there. I tried Sweden, and I could not do it there. As a last resort I tried America itself, and from New York I bought the steel ingots which were exported from New York and sent into Glasgow, and there I made my steel tubes. I employed my men, I employed my capital, and I sent the tubes out to New York and was paid a price which was an ample remuneration to myself."

That shows that "dumping" is not always a very profitable policy, even for those who indulge in it. The result of that "dumping" was to bring back to the United States, in competition with their own manufactures, manufactures that came from this country.

There is another sort of dumping. We have not heard a word about it either from the Member for West Birmingham or from the Government. The Member for West Bristol did make some allusion to it last night. I mean the bounties paid by the Colonies — the bounties paid by Canada on the export of all iron manufactured goods to this country which comply with their conditions. Are our manufacturers to accept that? Is that in the scheme for having a better footing with the Colonies? Are we to accept "dumping" from them without any countervailing duty to meet it? A merchant in Wolverhampton who exports large quantities of goods to the East told me the other day that a complaint was made to him by one of the largest firms with whom he had been doing business for many years that he was not buying from them as he used to do. He said—

> "No, I can buy cheaper elsewhere." He was asked, "Do you get the goods from Germany?" "No I do not." "Then you get them from the United States?" He said, "No, I do not." "If it is not an impertinent question, may I ask where you do get them from?" "Oh, yes; I get them from Canada."

And buying cheaper from Canada he is able to send those goods to other parts of the world. I am not going to argue the right or wrong of any specific case. I want the House to see that this question of retaliation is surrounded with difficulties. I might almost quote Mr. Gladstone's words and say I believe it passes the wit of man to devise any scheme which will meet those difficulties, which will not involve this country in greater difficulties, in greater dangers, and in worse results to our trade. How are you going to retaliate on the United States? They send us about £20,000,000 a year of manufactured goods, and you send £20,000,000 to them, and all the rest is food and raw material. Retaliation to be effective must be based on the taxation of food; there is no help for it. Those who say they are strong opponents of any taxation on food and yet are prepared to accept the undefined, unexplained, and unexplainable theory of retaliation, I think are playing with double-edged tools.

What is the issue before this House? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, with his usual acuteness, desired to put us on to another scent. It was "confidence in the Government"; it was belief in the boundless wisdom of the Government; in the long experience of the Government; in every element that makes up a strong Administration. Upon those grounds we ought not to disturb the present position. My right hon. friend's Amendment is not a censure of the Government. There is not a line of censure of the Government. There is no saying what they ought to have done that they have not done, what they might have done and have not done, what they ought to have done but what they do not propose to do. What does the Amendment say? It says this—

> "We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House"—

This House has a right to have judgment on a question of this kind. This House has a right to express its judgment on a great question of Imperial policy without restraint and without any other Party issue being drawn into it.

> "We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population."

Are you going to vote "No" to that? Does the right hon. Gentleman say "No" to that? The hon Member who has just spoken will say "No," and I have no doubt the Member for Sheffield will say "No," but the House of Commons would not say "No" to that. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol says he must vote against that. What is the next point?

> "This House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being."

I am ready to go to the country on that issue. The man who votes against that Resolution as forming a part of his own judgment or the judgment of the House is committed to the policy of protection. He is committed to the policy of the Prime Minister of reversing, deleting, destroying, the fiscal policy that this country has possessed for the last two generations. That is the issue we challenge; that is the issue we shall take. I, Sir, for one, believing as I do in the gigantic consequences of this disaster; believing as I do in the terrible calamity in which protection would involve our trade, commerce, manufacturers, and the working classes of all shades and descriptions; knowing as I do that there is not a tittle of reliable evidence to show that any of these disasters have resulted from the adoption of free trade—I avow myself an anti-protectionist and a staunch and convinced free-trader.

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BONAR LAW, Glasgow, Blackfriars): The House will have noticed that there is a return on the Benches opposite to the tone which marked them on the first night of the session. It struck me that this tone had rather disappeared after the debate on the War Amendment. It has now come back, and I for one do not regret it, for I think the jubilant tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman will make our debates more interesting. The right hon. Gentleman incidentally used the phrase "wandering in the wilderness," and he applied it to us. It struck me while he was speaking, that perhaps hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite should not be too confident. I have seen them confident before, and the simile about the wilderness reminds me that the leader who conducted the people to the chosen land was not the leader who actually led them into it. There is another lesson for the rank and file of the Party opposite, which is, that of the vast host who went into the wilderness, a very small number indeed were permitted to do more than look upon the promised land.

Sir, this is a very big subject, and I scarcely know where to begin, and if I may judge from the experience of this debate it may be yet more difficult later on to know where to end. The right hon. Gentleman devoted a large part of the introduction of his speech to an examination of the differences between members of the Cabinet and to the action of the Prime Minister in regard to them. The fact that he thought it necessary to do so is the best proof that the Party opposite made a great mistake in insisting on taking this debate when the Prime Minister could not be present, for no one except the Prime Minister can possibly answer the questions the right hon. Gentleman has raised.

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman dealt largely with history. He alluded to what took place in Sir Robert Peel's Government, and he thought that we ought to have acted in the same way. But there is one marked distinction. Famine was abroad in the land at the time when Sir Robert Peel was Prime Minister, and he had to take action then and there. We have not as a Government to take any action now, and we do not intend to take any. We are putting a policy before the country, and it will be for the country to decide whether or not they accept it. But, interested as I was in the right hon. Gentleman's history, I was still more interested in the history of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose. He dealt with a period about which there has been much difference of opinion. The right hon. Gentleman brushed aside as absolutely irrelevant the prophecies which Cobden made in regard to this very question. I do not think they are very important, but I do not think they are irrelevant. What were those prophecies? The first was that the change would not injure the agriculture of this country. Does the right hon. Gentleman say that if, in the great meetings of people interested in agriculture which Cobden addressed, he had told them what its effect would be on agriculture that would have had no influence on their minds? Then take the other prophecy, which I think is more important—that every nation in the world would adopt our system in five years. It may be quite true that Cobden did not make that the staple of his speech, but it is to be assumed that since Cobden stated it he believed it, for I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that no one in English politics was ever more candid or straightforward than Cobden. If Cobden believed it, does the right hon. Gentleman or anyone say that it did not influence his mind as to the effect of the policy which he was putting before the country. If Cobden had foreseen that instead of our getting free access to every market in the world, all the great countries would be doing everything in their power to prevent our selling to them, does the right hon. Gentleman say that that would have had no influence on Cobden's mind?

There is another aspect of this question. When my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham gave his version of the history of the Corn Laws Agitation, a howl went up all over the country from those who felt that one of their most cherished superstitions was being taken from them. But what were the statements made by my right hon. friend to which exception was taken? The first was that the Corn Laws agitation was not a working men's agitation, that the working men stood aloof from it. The second was that it was carried entirely by the manufacturing classes. The third was that it was carried by the manufacturing classes largely on account of their selfish interests. If we are told that that is a Birmingham heresy, then at all events Cobden was one of the heretics. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose is a great authority on history, especially the history of this period, and I certainly would not venture to put my opinion against his, least of all in the House of Commons, but when I find that the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman as a politician is controverted by his opinion as a man of letters, I do not hesitate. I take again those three points. The first was that it was not a working men's agitation. The right hon. Gentleman himself says, in his "Life of Cobden," that it was not the working classes in whom Cobden had confidence. More than that, Cobden wrote a letter—which is in the right hon. Gentleman's book—in which he charged the leaders of the working classes with having stood aloof from that movement.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): Why does the hon. Gentleman try to draw a distinction between what I say as a politician and what I have said as a man of letters? There is no difference whatever.

*Mr. BONAR LAW: I certainly understood the right hon. Gentleman in his speech last night to controvert the statement to which I refer.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: Oh, no.

*Mr. BONAR LAW: Well, if he did not others have done so. The next point was that the repeal of the Corn Laws was carried by the manufacturing classes. Again, in the "Life of Cobden" there is a letter in which he distinctly says that that was so. The third point was, that it was carried by the manufacturing classes on account of their own interests. Perhaps the House would like me to read the passage referring to that—> "I am afraid that most of us entered upon this struggle with the view that we had a distinct class interest in the question, and that we should carry it by a manifestation of our will against the will of other portions of the community."

[Cries of "Go on."] I have not the book with me, but I saw nothing in it to contradict that. There is another sentence in Cobden's letter which is of interest. The right hon. Gentleman addressed an enthusiastic meeting at Manchester; the spirit of Cobden seemed to permeate the atmosphere, but I think if the right hon. Gentleman had chosen to read this letter it would have had a very damping effect on the enthusiasm of his audience. Let me read it—

> "To confess my honest belief I regard a Manchester constituency now that its gross pocket question is settled as a very unsound and unsafe one."

But there is another city of which Cobden spoke in a very different way; of it he said—

> "I have always had the opinion that the social and political state of the town is far more healthy than that of Manchester."

What was that other city? it was the city of Birmingham.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Because Manchester had rejected Mr. Bright, and Birmingham had accepted him.

*MR. BONAR LAW: I think the words I have read go a little farther than a single election. Now I wish to draw another inference from the "Life of Cobden." I am called by the right hon. Gentleman a full fledged protectionist. It is not the first time I have been so named. I remember that in the first debate on this subject I was spoken of not only as a protectionist, but as a Canadian protectionist, which is, I suppose, a very bad species. But if I am a protectionist I say that the word has not now the meaning which was attached to it sixty years ago. My right hon. friend the Member for West Bristol last night gave a definition in which I agree, for it exactly expresses the view which I have always held. He said that those are not protectionists whose aim is to increase the export trade of this country.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH (Bristol, W.): No, I did not say that.

*MR. BONAR LAW: I alluded to the remark made by my right hon. friend that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham began he was in favour of increasing our foreign trade, and that now he had ceased to be in favour of it. At all events, whatever may be the opinion of my right hon. friend, I say that as regards this question our aims are exactly the same as the aims of Cobden. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Yes, our aims are the same, and just as Cobden tried to carry out the policy he believed in, in the way best adapted to the existing conditions of the country at that time, so we are trying to carry out our aims in the best way adapted to the present conditions of the country. [AN HON. MEMBER: Who are we?] I mean His Majesty's Government, and our aim is to increase and not restrict the foreign trade of this country. There is to my mind a great difference between the views held by Cobden and the views which are now put forward in his name. To judge by the speeches made by those who are opposed to any change in our fiscal system, their whole object appears to be that we ought to keep things cheap. Cobden did not say that, for he said deliberately—

> "I do not aim at cheapness at all, but what I aim at is a free interchange of commodities."

He did not say he aimed at cheapness for a very good reason. He was a business man and he knew, as every business man knows now, that the times when prices are lowest are the times when working men are worst off. [MINISTERIAL cries of "Hear, hear!" and OPPOSITION cries of "No, no."] Then I invite hon. Gentlemen opposite to study the Blue-books upon this matter. What is it that makes prices low? It is bad trade. [OPPOSITION cries of "No, no!"] Bad trade makes the prices of all commodities low, and if my hon. friends opposite will study the charts in the Blue-book they will find that invariably when prices are lowest, employment is worst in this country. It is good trade that makes high prices, and if the sole object that we have in view is to have things always cheap, there is nothing easier. To keep prices always low all that is necessary is to keep trade always bad; and to do hon. Gentlemen opposite justice when they have been in power they have generally succeeded in attaining that object. Cobden expressed his view in a parable when he asked his audience to suppose this country to be separated from the rest of the world, not by the ocean but by the River Thames, in the midst of which a powerful demon prevented trade between those on one side who had raw material and those on the other who required that material for manufactures. Cobden laid the demon in his day; but he has risen again. ["Hear, hear," and cries of "Name."] True, he allows the stream of commerce to flow in one direction; he allows buying, but prevents selling. The policy of the Prime Minister is to lay that demon once more, and to give us again free exchange, to make it possible to sell freely as well as to buy freely. We are told there is no need for this: have we not got the most-favoured-nation clause? In the debate on the Sugar Convention I ventured to say that we attached to that clause a superstitious value which it did not possess. We know more about it now, we know so much about it that no hon. Gentleman opposite has ventured to put that argument forward. I shall not therefore say anything more about it at present. But we are told that retaliation is useless, that tariff wars always fail. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwick has made himself specially prominent in stating this view. I wonder where he got his information. In recent years there have been three tariff wars, and the most important of these has been between Germany and Russia. In that instance the issue was clear. Russia put on high duties, and Germany, having remonstrated in vain, engaged in a tariff war and got her way. German exports to Russia which between 1880 and 1892 fell from £10,000,000 to £6,000,000 sterling, in the years 1893 to 1901 rose again to £16,000,000. A tariff war is bad, costly, and only to be resorted to in the last extremity, but because a tariff war is costly is no reason why we should stand defenceless before armed nations. An ordinary war is also bad, but we should not therefore do away with our Navy and disband our Army. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, in a speech delivered in Scotland, said—

> "What would the Colonies have done—what would they do now, without the protection of our Fleets and our Army?"

I am glad the right hon. Gentleman realises the importance of that, and I hope when the time comes when he sits on these Benches, he will not forget the importance of our Army and Navy. I do not think anyone in this country needs to go to foreign countries at all to find what is the value of retaliation. We have had under our own eyes for the last six months an example of exactly what we mean. It is an object lesson so good that if the country could realise what it is, our case would be won from that one lesson alone. Canada gave a preference to this country which Germany resented. She showed that resentment not only by putting higher duties on Canadian imports, but by intimating that if other colonies followed the example of Canada it would be hardly possible to avoid retaliation not only against those colonies but against Great Britain as well. This was at the time when Germany, like the rest of the world, thought we should never use the power we possessed; but things have happened since, South Africa and New Zealand have given commercial preferences to the mother country, but there has been no carrying out of the threat of retaliation by Germany. Germany knows better now, and she has not only refrained from retaliation against the mother country, but she has not even put on retaliatory duties against those colonies.

And now I would like to say a word about a remark which fell from my right hon. friend the Member for West Bristol. I heard the right hon. Gentleman say that he attached no material value to the preference we received from Canada. Now I know something about the trade of Canada, and I beg to protest as a member of His Majesty's Government against that statement, and I say that it is not the view held either by the Government or the people of this country. I wish to point out how that remark of the right hon. Gentleman contrasts with the main part of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman dwelt upon the importance of new foreign markets. How then can he face the chance of losing any outside market we still have? No one can deny that those preferences, although they may not give us as much as we should like, do give us something which is really of value to this country. This Canadian preference at least is worth something. Now what are the facts? In the years 1886 to 1896 our exports into Canada fell from £8,000,000 to £6,000,000, and during the same period exports from Germany to Canada rose to the extent of 300 per cent. ["Hear, hear" and cries of "Give figures."] The rise was from £400,000 to £1,200,000. The whole case was one of percentages. Our exports to Canada rose from £6,000,000 in 1896 to £10,000,000 in 1902. It was true German exports rose in the same period, but while our rise was to the extent of £4,000,000 the German rise was £1,100,000.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): What are the percentages before and after preference?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Perhaps as my hon. friend is alluding to what I said I may venture to state that what I said was this, not that our exports to Canada have not risen under preference,—certainly they did—although the extent to which they did rise was described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham as altogether disappointing—but what I said was that in spite of preference to us the trade between Canada and Germany, Canada and France, and Canada and the United States had risen more in proportion than the trade of the United Kingdom with Canada.

*MR. BONAR LAW: What the right hon. Gentleman says is perfectly true; it is exactly what I said to the House. But what the right hon. Gentlemen omitted to say, and what I pointed out is, that until we got the preference our trade was going down, and that after preference our trade continued to increase. [AN HON. MEMBER: What about the United States?] An hon. Gentleman asks me—What about the United States? Is there anyone in the House who does not know that the imports from the United States are largely raw material. They are imports that we do not want to send and could not send. What we are interested in is manufactured articles, and of these we want to increase the exports. It is ridiculous to have to argue this on the figures. If it is the case that we can compete at all in the Colonies—and 23 per cent. of our exports of manufactured goods are to the self-governing Colonies—it is surely obvious to any business man that the preference given in Canada equal to 10 per cent. on the value of the goods must enable us to compete much more successfully.

You have heard a great deal during the recess about exports and imports. I should like to say a little on that subject. The theory of everyone who is opposed to any change in our fiscal system is that it is imports which are the best test of the prosperity of the trade of a country; that if you look after the imports the exports will take care of themselves. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition elaborated that the other day at Glasgow. He put it in a nutshell. He said that if by any change of policy you stop the imports of a pound's worth of goods from any country, you will at the same time stop the export of a pound's worth of goods to some other country. Well, that is a very beautiful theory. [AN HON. MEMBER: It is a fact.] An hon. Gentleman says it is a fact, but if it is true it should be easy to prove it. I will give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity of proving it later on, but in the meantime I will prove the opposite. You can take any series of years you like, but I shall take the series given in detail in the Blue-book, which, by the way, hon. Gentlemen say proves their case up to the hilt, though they have never attempted to show how it proves it. From 1890 to 1902 our imports of manufactured goods increased to the extent of £50,000,000 sterling; if the theory of the right hon. Gentleman is true, should not our export of manufactured goods have some kind of relation to the increased imports? [Cries of "No."] Then what becomes of the theory? The theory of the right hon. Gentleman really means that the more you buy from foreign countries, in spite of any effort they may make to prevent you selling to them, the more they will buy from you. The fact is that the more we buy from every one of those industrial countries, our competitors, the less, and not the more, they buy from us. The right hon. Member for East Fife, who has made himself the great protagonist of this theory, has put it in another way which is quite as striking and impressive. He said this, and I think they are almost his words. "The excess of the imports over the exports of any country is itself a measure of the trading prosperity of that country."

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): But not the measure of difference between the exported merchandise and the imported merchandise?

*MR. BONAR LAW: I shall take the total exports in the case I am going to give. If the right hon. Gentleman's theory is true, then the reverse of it, I think he will admit, must be true also. If the excess of imports is a proof of prosperity, then if you can find any country where the exports steadily, regularly, and largely exceed the imports that country must be drifting into bankruptcy. The United States is such a country. For the last six years the total exports of the United States have exceeded the total imports to the extent of more than £100,000,000 sterling a year. If you make allowance for freight, the excess is still nearly £100,000,000. What I ask the right hon. Gentleman, or anyone else who feels competent to answer is—How is that excess paid for? I know of no way except by the transfer of capital from this or some other country to America.

Sir EDGAR VINCENT (Exeter): Payment of interest.

*Mr. BONAR LAW: Payment of interest in this case is transfer of capital. I know of no way that the excess is paid for, except by the transfer of capital, but if anyone else has another theory I shall be glad to consider it. What has been the effect of that excess of exports in the case of the United States? The effect has been that the bank rate, and the value of money in America, which used to be enormously higher than with us, has fallen until it is now practically at the same level. I know this is rather dreary, but I must say a word or two from our point of view about exports and imports. So far as I am concerned, at least I am not opposed to the quantity of imports. It is the quality of the imports that we object to. We would like to see more raw material coming in and less manufactured goods. I am not going to give the figures about this, but I will try to put in another way. If this question could really be looked upon not as a Party question — I know that is quite impossible and I do not want to alter it—I think this would almost be admitted. If you take any country whose ideal is to be a great manufacturing and exporting country, and if you find in the case of that country that over any period of years in the last thirty, taking imports first, the percentage of raw material is declining and the percentage of manufactured articles is increasing, and if, turning to exports, you find that the percentage of manufactured goods is diminishing and the percentage of raw material is increasing, and if you find that in every other industrial country in the world the reverse is the case, that is surely an indication that our industry is not in a healthy condition. What are the facts? Let me take the five years 1880 to 1884, and contrast them with the last five years. We find this in the case of imports—the percentage of manufactured goods has risen to the extent of 7 per cent. and raw material has declined in proportion. If you take our whole exports the percentage of manufactured goods has fallen 5 per cent. and raw material has risen 5 per cent.

Mr. ASQUITH: What raw material?

*Mr. BONAR LAW: What I want to point out is that the exact reverse of this has happened in Germany and the United States, and it is not by accident that that has happened. Those countries have used all their power to encourage the import of raw materials and to discourage the import of manufactured articles. They have encouraged the export of manufactured articles and discouraged the export of raw material. We alone of all countries in the world leave that entirely to chance and we are the one country where both in imports and exports, as regards percentages, we are going backwards.

Now I want to refer to a subject which has been jubilantly dealt with by right hon. Gentlemen opposite—the Board of Trade figures for last year. They were greatly delighted with them, and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition stated that these figures alone knocked down the scaffolding of the case which had been erected. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen went one better than that. He said that anyone who stated in the face of these figures that our trade was not flourishing was capable of anything. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite were all agreed about one thing, namely, that it was not fair to take a single year and draw an inference from it, but apparently that only applies to a year that tells against them. It is quite right to take a single year when it seems to help their argument. I think I shall succeed in showing that it only seems to help their argument. We cannot analyse the figures for last year because we have not the facts, and without complete analysis it is absurd to draw any large inference from them. We do know that simultaneously with the large increase in our foreign trade the percentage of persons unemployed in this country has enormously increased. How do you reconcile those two facts on the theory of the right hon. Gentleman opposite? You connot reconcile them, but I think we can do something towards reconciling them. We say that exports are a better test of prosperity—we do not go further than that—than imports. You will find on an analysis of the figures for the year that the whole of the increased exports took place in the first six months, and, as might naturally have been expected, during those six months there was no falling off in employment. What happened? In the second half of the year the exports did not increase, but the imports increased enormously, and with the increase of imports, and corresponding with it, there was an increase in the number of unemployed.

I want next to say a word as to "dumping." The House will hear a great deal more about the question, and I admit, speaking for myself, that it was "dumping" which first convinced me that some change in our fiscal system was absolutely necessary. What is the effect of "dumping" on our industries? The right hon. Member for West Bristol was right when he said that the issue we are now fighting is the same issue fought last year over the Sugar Convention Act. The effect of bounties on the sugar industry was to bring the West Indies almost to the verge of ruin, not so much on account of price as on account of the uncertainty which the bounties introduced into all the conditions of the industry, and the effect on our manufacturers to-day is exactly the same. Every manufacturer in this country is threatened by a competition which does not depend on natural laws, on cost of production, on supply and demand. It is a competition the extent of which no amount of prudence can foresee, and against which no amount of skill can prevail. The fact is that our manufacturers are paralysed. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh!"] They have not that confidence in their trade which is the spring and the soul of industry, and they are afraid to spend money in improving old works or to build new works. I would like to illustrate this point from the position of the iron and steel trade of this country. The Board of Trade issued last year a paper which gave full details of the production of iron and steel in the United States, Germany, and the United Kingdom. I leave the United States out, which has enormous resources in raw material, but what about Germany? Germany has no such advantages; she imports as we do, a large part of the ore used in making steel, and as to coal, which is the basis of the manufacture of steel, she has no advantage over us, for she imports every year a large quantity of coal from us to make the steel which she sends back to us. That is not all. We actually send to Germany every year a considerable quantity of pig-iron which she sends back to us in the shape of finished steel. A few years ago we made the iron and steel for almost the whole of the world. In 1902 we made approximately the same quantity of raw iron as was made in Germany, but in the manufactured article in steel the German production was nearly twice as great as ours.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: They have the cheap ore.

*MR. BONAR LAW: I myself sold to Germany hundreds of thousands of tons of ore which came from our own colonies. It is a fact that we are being left hopelessly behind in that which is regarded in almost every country as the best index of the industrial prosperity of a country. How is that accounted for? I can see in no way except that it is due to the supineness of our manufacturers or to the lower wages which prevail in Germany. The right hon. Member for East Fife says that it is due to some "defect" in our manufacturers. Well, is the right hon. Gentleman quite confident that he is a competent judge. I have been in another place occasionally where I have seen familiar faces from both sides of this House disguised in an unfamiliar way. I have heard them speaking fortunately for us at an unfamiliar length, and when I have heard them droning away as though they would never stop and been told what the fees were which they received for that dreary performance I have said to myself what a splendid profession? What an easy way of making a living. I really know that it is not so. I know that it only seems easy to me because I do not know enough about it to understand the difficulties. Might it not be possible that the right hon. Gentleman is exactly in the same position? Well, I will say this as regards the iron and steel trade that I know all the manufacturers in Scotland and many of them in England; and I do not know one large firm which does not know, generally from observation, everything that is done in their trade in America or in Germany. Our manufacturers have adopted a great many of their methods, and if they have not adopted all of them it is because our manufacturers think the risk greater than the chance of profit. It is not defects of manufacture or lower wages. The ground lies deeper than that. In modern production the thing which tells most in cheapness is quantity produced; and you cannot produce largely unless you have a large market. We have not a large market. Germany has her own market, which she keeps to herself, and she has access to our market. Then in London iron goods are being brought from Germany at a lower rate of freight than it costs to bring them from Scotland. I ask the House to consider what the effect of a policy of retaliation would be on this trade. Either we would obtain better terms from Germany and access to her markets, in which case our market would be increased, or at the worst we would make it difficult for them to obtain access to our market and their market would be decreased. [Cries of "Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members might sneer at that, but manufacturers did not.

Lord HUGH CECIL (Greenwich): Do I understand—I only ask for information—that when these duties have failed in their object they will be permanently kept on?

*Mr. BONAR LAW: That is a question which I at least do not intend to answer—[Laughter]—and hon. Gentlemen cannot expect any other answer from me. The effect of this policy would not only be to stimulate our own manufactures but to handicap our competitors. It would make it difficult for them to produce as cheaply as they do so as to compete with us not only in our own market but in the neutral markets of the world. How does it strike observers from the other point of view? The Finance Minister in Germany lately made a speech in reference to this development of German trade helping the country to tide over a bad year, in which he said that the German exports largely to our markets had made it possible for German manufacturers to keep their works open. There is another question as to dumping. What is the effect on the men who are engaged in industry? Take the case of steel forgings for shipbuilding which come from Germany. Workmen are thrown out of employment, machinery gets out of repair, and even when prices improve the works are not resumed because there is no security that the improvement will last long enough. But does anyone believe that when our productive capacity has been permanently reduced, Germany will continue to send us these goods at below cost price? In the long run we must pay very dearly for having allowed our own productive capacity to be destroyed. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition Benches.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite may sneer at the idea of a monopoly, they did so in connection with the Sugar Bill last year. I know a particular instance where a monopoly exists just now. I admit that it is a very small one. Wire nails are used to a considerable extent in this country. They are made in Germany and the United States. For a long time we got them cheaply because they competed against us, but, having combined, they sell them to the people here at a high price. You can now only buy them wholesale from an individual in London who quotes these nails for the United Kingdom at £7 10s. delivered in London, but the price for Japan is £5 5s. free on board Antwerp. You can verify the facts. There is no doubt about them. The price for Japan is £5 5s. Why? Because the Japanese are making them themselves, and have a duty which makes it necessary to sell them at a low price, or otherwise they could not be sent in. Then what becomes of the theory that the importer always pays the duty? In this case, it is in a sense true. It is the importer that pays the duty, but it is the English importer who pays the Japanese duty. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last said he always learnt something when he went to Scotland, but I can assure him that he teaches us something also. He is a great believer in this theory that the importer pays the duty. Let me read an extract of what the right hon. Gentleman said in Glasgow. I do not think it will be necessary to make any comment on it.

> "If some happy state of circumstances should arise in Scotland in which some proposition could be made that the 10s. duty per gallon should be retained on all foreign spirits, but that it should not be charged on spirits distilled at home, the price of spirits would not go down. It would remain exactly where it was, but the distillers at home would put the duty into their pockets."

Here is an article the cost of which is about 1s. a gallon, the duty being 11s., and the right hon. Gentleman says that in the case of an article like that the force of competition would not prevent distillers still selling it at 12s. a gallon, even if the duty were removed.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: What I said was that where a revenue duty was levied and no corresponding excise duty was levied to an equivalent amount, that was protection to the native producer, and that he would put the money into his own pocket.

MR. BONAR LAW: The right hon. Gentleman's interruption makes no difference to the argument. The favourite doctrine of hon. Gentlemen opposite, on which their whole theory rests, is the doctrine of the transfer of industry. We know that the bringing in of goods below cost price deprives particular men of employment. Hon. Gentlemen say that when a man is turned out of one job he soon gets another. Let us take the tin plate trade. I think it has been cited by the right hon. Gentleman in proof of this theory. The right hon. Gentleman said at Glasgow—

> "Look at this industry. Look how when one door is shut another door opens."

What is the door that is shut, and what is the door that opens? In 1890 the right hon. Gentleman admitted that the tinplate trade received a knock-down blow. But look, said the right hon. Gentleman, how it has crept up again. The right hon. Gentleman must be thankful for very small mercies. In fourteen years the tinplate trade has crept up, but it is not yet up to the level of 1890. But what about the men who were employed in this industry; the men who in 1890 knew how to make tinplates and did not know how to make anything else, were they to stand idle while the trade was creeping up? The right hon. Gentleman says that many of them went to America. That is perfectly true. They had to go to other countries to secure employment denied them at home. Many of them did something else. They joined the great army of casual labourers, which according to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition is constantly on the verge of hunger. I want to put a clear issue on this question of the transfer of industry. Last year we imported iron and steel goods to the value of over £10,000,000 sterling. The President of the Iron and Steel Institute said in Glasgow that there were still works and workmen in this country capable of turning out every ton of that iron and steel, and that if it had been turned out in this country it would represent £5,000,000 in wages. Surely in this case the burthen of proof lies not on us but on the defenders of the present system. The workmen lost all that amount of wages, and will the right hon. Gentleman tell us what they have got in exchange? It is said that dumping cannot last. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife went further. He said that universal experience proved that it could not last, and that it led to discontent in the country that dumped and ultimately to the abolition of protection.

MR. ASQUITH: No I did not say that. I said it led to discontent and to a reaction of opinion in the country which dumped which sooner or later would be fatal to protection.

MR. BONAR LAW: I am very sorry I cannot find at the moment the extract from the right hon. Gentleman's speech, but what he has just said is quite good enough for my case. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to give the House any single instance in the world where the dumping of an article has begun and has stopped. There is no such case. Why then does the right hon. Gentleman speak of "universal experience?" He probably means that that is his opinion. Perhaps he means that it will be the experience of the future. But that is prophecy; and, as somebody said, you cannot argue with a prophet, you can only refuse to believe him. I do refuse to believe him. Why should this dumping end? It is impossible to get out of the right hon. Gentleman's mind the idea that because an article is sold below cost price that therefore it is sold at a loss. Nothing of the kind. If the House will bear with me I will show exactly what it is that happens. Suppose there is in America a steel works capable of producing 100 tons of steel per day, and suppose the American demand is only seventy-five tons per day. It costs £5 10s. to make seventy-five tons; but the maker finds that if he makes 100 tons the cost of the whole is reduced about 10s. per ton. What happens? He formerly sold seventy-five tons at £6 per ton, making a profit of 10s., but by making 100 tons, and still selling at £6, he makes a profit of 20s., and has £37 10s. additional profit in the seventy-five tons. He has twenty-five tons left over to dispose of; he sends the twenty-five tons over here, and sells it at £4 a ton, or a pound below cost price, and makes a profit of £12 10s. on the transaction. Who is going to stop that? No one in America suffers in the least in consequence of it. The consumer there does not pay a penny the more. The steel maker makes a profit and, this above all, the workmen get full wages on 100 tons instead of on seventy-five tons. Who suffers? The British steel maker and the British working man. Who is likely to end it—those who gain by it, or those who suffer from it? It never will be ended until we end it.

*Lord GEORGE HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I had not intended to say anything concerning the incidents connected with my resignation. I fully explained those circumstances in a public speech, and I see no good now in reverting to the matter. There was undoubtedly a misunderstanding, but it is one to which I do not now care to allude. I left the Cabinet because I declined to be associated with a movement which then, although it was euphemistically called "fiscal reform," meant in my mind "protection." But even if any misunderstanding which then existed between me and the Prime Minister had been removed, I certainly should never have remained a member of the Government after the speech which the Prime Minister delivered at Sheffield. I felt in a position of considerable difficulty at the commencement of this debate. An Amendment has been moved from the other side which accurately describes, as far as it goes, my views on this fiscal controversy. I may say that I have held during the whole course of my political life principles identical with those contained in the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Montrose, and I have for more than twenty years sat upon that Bench, and for thirty years I have been connected with what, in my belief, may be truly called fiscal reform in India. I have spoken on behalf of the Governments of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Salisbury, and with the absolutely unanimous approval of my colleagues, have laid down principles to regulate Indian fiscal policy identical with those contained in the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. For me now to turn round and repudiate those principles would not be merely to subordinate my own opinions; it would practically be to make the whole of my past political life, and the policy which, on behalf of the Imperial Government, I have enforced on India, a subterfuge and a fraud. Now, my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade opened his speech by saying that there was nothing in this Amendment if you excluded the first sentence, to which he could not subscribe.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: No. I said I did not think there was anything in the latter part of the Amendment to which free-fooders would not subscribe, and I said there was very little to which I could not subscribe.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: My right hon. friend is reported to have said, "there was little to which he could not subscribe." Now let us see what are the doctrines to which my right hon. friend can with little difficulty subscribe—

> "We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being."

Those are the words to which my right hon. friend says he can without much difficulty subscribe.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, I said there was little in it to which I could not subscribe. [Cries of "What is the little?"] I thought I had explained yesterday that I personally should be glad to see a state of opinion in this country which would allow preferences with a moderate tax on food, and to that opinion I adhere.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I will take my right hon. friend's exact words. The Amendment exactly describes the position of the Unionist Free Food League, and therefore my right hon. friend admits that our position and the principles we hold are such that he has little difficulty in subscribing to them. Now that is a most remarkable admission. It is a great change since—when, I cannot say—but it does mark a distinct departure from the language which hitherto has been used by those who spoke on behalf of the Government. My right hon. friend, having prefaced his observations in this way, then proceeded to make a further series of statements. I must enumerate them because they are so important. The Government policy was not that of protection; it was not that of my right hon. friend the late Secretary for the Colonies; therefore, putting two negatives together, I think an affirmative proposition can be made out. He went on to say that it does not involve the taxation of food, and it is not connected with a 10 per cent. duty on manufactured goods; that nothing was to be done until the next election, and that then a mandate was to be asked for from the people to confirm a power which the Government at the present moment possesses, and that when the country has given this peculiar mandate any proposition made is to be submitted fully to the discussion and control of this House. Well, now, I really ask my right hon. friend, has the whole country been turned upside down, has a state of disquiet and apprehension been spread through every great industry in this country, has an interference with those natural recuperative processes which a great nation like ours can go through after heavy exactions been caused by this agitation, and have so many resignations occurred that ex-Cabinet Ministers are tumbling over one another in search for seats by this gangway and is the end of it all this —that the Government only want confirmation of an inherent power which they possess, which they can make use of, and which I who have seceded from them was the first to make use of in imposing countervailing sugar duties in India? I feel rather ashamed to resort to so hackneyed a quotation, but is it not true, parturiunt montes nascetur ridiculus mus? It is, I must say, a triumph for us poor free-fooders. We have been attacked; committees of our own constituents are even trying to hound us out of the representation of the places for which we sit; we are looked upon as renegades and sectaries; and yet the first time there is a discussion in this House that first time we stand triumphant. We have knocked food taxation out of the programme of the Government.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No food taxation was in the Sheffield programme.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No, Sir; but perhaps my right hon. friend will look at the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the late Secretary for the Colonies, and if he will look at that he will see that the pith of the letter is in the postcript, of which this is a fair paraphrase—"I would suggest that for tactical reasons it might be advisable to exclude taxation of food from the Government Party programme."

Therefore, I say, if the right hon. Gentleman will reflect and carry his mind back a little further, I think he will admit that I am accurate in saying that it is the Unionist free-fooders who have prevented the Government from being committed to the taxation of food, with which they now see it is hopeless to persevere. My right hon. friend made a very able speech, and he laid down the proposition that this fiscal controversy was not a contest between free trade and protection. Sir, I manitain that it is a contest between those two principles, and, able as was the speech of my hon. friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade, I wholly deny that protection has changed its character. What does free trade mean? I think I could give a definition of it which nobody will dispute. Free trade means the removal, in the interests of the consumer of legislative restrictions upon the free exchange of commodities. I believe that to be an accurate description of free trade. Protection is the reverse. Protection means the imposition of restrictions for the benefit of certain interests and individuals at the expense of the community. In their conception, in their operation, and in their effect the two principles are absolutely irreconcilable, and I protest, and have all along protested, against the use of the phrase "fiscal reform." What does it mean? In the eyes of a protectionist, is a free trader a fiscal reformer? In the eyes of a free trader, is a protectionist a fiscal reformer? Twice only in my life has there been an attempt to carry a great revolutionary change through this House. One was the attempt of Mr. Gladstone to carry Home Rule for Ireland; and now we have had fiscal proposals made to us which involve a revolution, in my judgment, quite as far-reaching and as dangerous as Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule proposals. Now, suppose at that time the Unionist Party had adopted on the question of the Union the same attitude as they have done on the fiscal controversy. Suppose that the Leader of that Party had said: "It is an entire mistake to assume that this is a question between Home Rule and the maintenance of the Union. Unless any one can say that the system of government in Ireland is perfect and carries with it no future danger, he must be an administrative reformer; and, moreover, recollect that the Union is nearly a hundred years old, and recollect Mr. Pitt; were all Mr. Pitt's prophecies fulfilled in connection with Ireland? The question before the country is administrative reform in Ireland. We will go to the country, and then when we get our mandate it will be quite time to determine whether administrative reform should be in the direction of Home Rule or not." Would not every one have said, and properly said, "It is gross trifling with a serious subject?" I contend, therefore, that the use of the phrase "fiscal reform" in the sense in which it is so constantly used from the Front Bench is a trifling with this grave subject. My right hon. friend last night made one statement which I admit was new to me. He said that the proposal to put a 10 per cent. duty on all manufactures imported from abroad was not a protective tax, but was purely a revenue tax.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir; my noble friend really misrepresents me. I never made any statement of that kind. What I said was that if the proposals of my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham involved the necessity of making good a deficiency caused by the transference of taxation from certain food products to certain other food products, the question of the mode in which that money should be raised was a question of revenue.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I understood him to say that 10 per cent. was a revenue tax. I want just to follow that up. Ever since that 10 per cent. tax has been before the public there has been a hunt after ruined industries, and in every part of the country inducements have been held out that if this 10 per cent. duty was imposed in some way or other industries which were suffering from foreign competition or otherwise languishing might be beneficially affected.

As several speakers, including the last, have expressed a strong opinion in favour of a policy of preferential treatment towards the Colonies, I want just to put before the House what the cost will be upon the consumer of the only scheme before us. My hon. friend who has just spoken referred to the Canadian figures, and he said that there had been a large increase in our exports in recent years. There has been an increase of two or three millions. [Sir H. VINCENT: Double.] No, pardon me; I am too well up in these figures. What happened was this—that the Canadians raised their tariff against us and our imports steadily fell for a long time; then came a Government who reduced the tariff, and our imports at once rose quite independently of any preferential treatment; and since then there has been a very large increase of Canadian exports, and that has naturally corresponded with the increase of our imports into that country. What are we going to get in the way of increased trade by preferential arrangements with the Colonies? So soon as my right hon. friend the late Secretary for the Colonies started his proposals, I, being of a somewhat prosaic character, sent for all the latest statistics relating to the trade of these colonies and the tariffs there in force. The fact is that those colonies have got very little to give us. They are clear and emphatic on this point, that no reduction will be made which will in any degree enable our manufacturers to compete with their native industries. Therefore we start with this—that we shall get no benefit in that direction. All we can get from preferential treatment is the absorption of imports which go to the Colonies from other countries. As a matter of fact the British Empire and the United States have almost a monopoly of the imports into Canada. The same state of things exists as regards Australasia. Out of £42,000,000 imports into Canada £37,000,000 come from the United States and from the British Empire, and the same proportion holds in Australasia. As a considerable amount of these imports come from tropical countries it follows that we cannot, do what we will, absorb the whole of those foreign imports. Therefore the very outside profit we can look forward to is an increase of our trade from preferential treatment of about £7,000,000 a year. Now put against that the cost. It has been calculated that this taxation of food and this 10 per cent. duty, which is part and parcel of a preferential arrangement, will impose upon the consumers of this country a burden of not less than £35,000,000 sterling, and possibly £50,000,000 sterling, a year. Therefore you start with this extraordinary proposal—that in order to increase our trade with the Colonies we are to submit to a burden which at the very outset is seven times as heavy as any problematical expansion of our export trade.

That is not all. My objection to the fiscal reformer is that he takes so narrow a survey of the situation that he is always wearing blinkers. Attention has been directed to the export trade mainly, but our export trade only employs a very small proportion of the labour engaged in this country. It is, I think, about 16 per cent., but the export trade from this country to the Colonies, which alone would be benefited by preferential treatment, only constitutes a small portion of the export trade, and so you come round, if you work it out, to this—that it is proposed to tax the food of 97 per cent. of the working population of this country in order to benefit 3 per cent. Is that business?

I should like to say a word or two upon one part of the British Empire to which no fiscal reformer has yet alluded; and it is somewhat satisfactory to me to find that on this, the second day of this very important debate, the views which I hold on fiscal matters generally, have been endorsed by my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, and that the opinions which I put forward on my own responsibility as regards India are entirely accepted by the Government, of India. It is the fashion now to sneer at cheapness, and some extraordinary doctrines in reference to it were laid down in that very able speech to which we have just listened from the Secretary to the Board of Trade. I do not pretend to be an authority on any particular trade, but I have had a great deal to do with the cotton trade of Lancashire, which is by far the most powerful and best organised trade in this country, and by far the largest exporting trade. Nearly 25 per cent. of the whole of our exports from this country consists of cotton manufactured goods, and half the exports from this country to India consist of cotton manufactured goods. The export trade of this country to India is in excess of that of all the self-governing Colonies who are likely to benefit under this preferential treatment. I laid down with the approval of my colleagues, the principle that in India there should be no protective duties, and that perfect equality of treatment should prevail between Lancashire cotton goods and the native industries. I received a deputation during last summer composed of leading men in that industry, and they asked me to remove the Customs duties on cotton. I replied that I could not do so, but I undertook that, so long as I was Secretary of State and those Customs duties were in force, the excise duties should also remain. I have been much attacked for attempting to establish this equality of treatment between India and Great Britain; but so long as free trade is the policy of this country and we believe in it, so long is it possible to establish that equality of treatment because it is beneficial to India as well as Great Britain. But the moment you depart and turn round to protection, it will not be possible for my successor to take the position which I have taken; and if protection is to be the policy of this Empire, and if those colonies who choose to establish protective tariffs are to have special favour shown them in tariff arrangements, can you deny to India that which the rest of the British Empire obtains? And if you cannot deny it to India, at once some £20,000,000 of your export trade is more or less in peril.

That is not all. I believe that the great danger to which the trade of this country will in the future be subject is an increase in the cost of production. That is practically the unanimous opinion, so for as I know, of the leading men in the cotton trade. There are enormous exports to the Far East exclusive of India, in which the exported article has to compete with native industries in localities where the raw material is grown and where there is an abundant supply of cheap labour; and they all tell me that although the turnover is large the profit is small, and any legislation or alteration which sends up the price of food or increases the cost of living will in the long run be fatal to the volume of that gigantic trade. Would it not be madness and unqualified folly for us to accept this idea of preferential treatment which has never been worked out, and the effect of which has only been considered in one small portion of the British Empire?

Just let me say one word on a matter which I think is very germane to this discussion. We are constantly told that we are Little Englanders because we object to the increased cost of these proposed schemes. I have been an Imperialist all my life, but I have always held that the extent to which Imperialism can be pushed must be limited by the expenditure which it entails. Our expenditure during the last ten years has increased nearly £50,000,000 sterling, and mainly in connection with the great services which the Government very properly have thought it necessary to bring up to that high state of efficiency to enable them to discharge more adequately Imperial duties. We have recently for Imperial objects fought a war in South Africa, and we have had to borrow enormously. The consequence of the burden of that borrowing is felt directly and indirectly by the taxpayers, because one of the ablest financiers in a masterly analysis of the money conditions of the City shows that, in consequence of the war expenditure and the raising of loans, almost for the first time in the history of man, money was dearer for two consecutive years in London than it was in Paris and Berlin. Think what that means. It means not only that there is additional taxation to pay for the interest on those loans, but every industry and every trade which at all relies upon the loan of money or requires assistance has to pay a higher rate of interest than it paid before. I contend that the two pillars of our gigantic trade, commerce and merchandise are cheap food and cheap money, and, looking at the disadvantages with which we have to contend against foreign nations through longer hours and lower wages, and the far larger proportion of the raw material and food which they can supply and their larger home markets, it seems to me that we should be fools and madmen to throw away one of these great advantages which we have in contending with them—namely, cheap food.

And, Sir, whilst I readily admit that a country can flourish under protection, still I contend that as has been the case here, where a country for fifty years has had the benefit of free imports you cannot convert a system based on free trade into one of protection without a fearful dislocation of business and without inflicting a terrible amount of misery and distress upon those who would never have remained in these islands had it not been for the free import of food. The only practical proposal therefore that the Government adhere to is retaliation. I listened with some alarm to the speech of the Secretary to the Board of Trade as to the very wide interpretation which he gave to this word retaliation. Just let me give an illustration. There has been three great tariff wars in Europe recently. My hon. friend mentioned three but he has picked out the only one which is favourable to his argument, but I am going to take the other two.

*MR. BONAR LAW: If you take Switzerland you get the same result.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No, no, let us go into that. I will first take the case of Italy and France. Italy and France were doing a great business amounting to £30,000,000 a year. Somebody came and said to the Italians, "put up your tariff," a similar appeal was made to the French, and up went the French tariff, and so the war went on for nearly ten years. At the end of that time the two countries had lost at the very owest calculation over £120,000,000 of trade. Peace was then made, and the trade of those countries has never got up to within 50 per cent. of what it was before the war. The same thing happened in Switzerland, only to a less extent, and the figures never reached the total at which they stood before, and why? If my hon. friends on this side of the House attach great importance to preferential treatment let them beware how they hastily rush into retaliation, because so soon as you declare war against another nation—and if we begin a war we must go on with it—as soon as you declare war up goes the tariff against you, and up goes your tariff against it. But it does not put up its tariff against the whole world and therefore it gives to all other countries, while it is fighting you, preferential treatment in its own market. And when the war is over, and you go to your conquered market, you will find it in the occupation of foreigners. I do not agree with my hon. friend that the tariff war between Germany and Russia ended with entire satisfaction to Germany. It was a terrific war. They began with 30 per cent. ad valorem, then 50 per cent. and then it went up to 70 per cent., and discontent and hardship was so intense in both countries that both Governments became frightened and had to come to terms, and although Germany has gained more than Russia there has been since that time permanent discontent amongst the Agrarian Party who look back with longing eyes to the high tariffs then imposed. On the other hand in Russia a false impetus was given to a large number of industries which have ever since been almost a source of danger to the Empire. Not only this but the United States and Argentina for the first time got a certain amount of position in the wheat markets of Germany. Therefore, I say, we ought to be very cautious how we hastily embark upon retaliation. I have no objection to it myself as a matter of principle, but my hon. friends behind me who are protectionists very keenly support retaliation, and no doubt an adroit Prime Minister will persuade the House of Commons that in order to extend the area of free trade he must have recourse to protective duties, but when the time comes to take them off what then will happen. If the contest is prolonged for a certain time the vested interests which have grown will become so strong that the Government will hesitate to take them off.

In that most interesting speech of the Secretary to the Board of Trade allusion was made to the enormous development of the United States and German export trade in recent years, and he seemed almost to indicate that we might take a lesson from German methods. Well the export trade may have increased, but it would be interesting to hear the opinion of the consumers inside those lands as to the methods by which that export trade has been developed. After all their methods are the most selfish and unpatriotic that can be well conceived. [A voice, "Not unpatriotic."] Not unpatriotic? What happened. They mercilessly fleeced the home consumer, and, having fleeced the home consumer, out of the profits paid by that unfortunate individual they supplied his foreign competitor with goods cheaper than they could get them themselves. My hon. friend alluded to the enormous amount of cheap German steel that had recently been "dumped" down here for shipbuilding purposes. But I do not think he gave as the result that—unless I am mistaken—almost for the first time the tonnage of English shipbuilding exceeded that of the rest of the world. I quite agree, and I always have felt that this question of "dumping" is a subject that has to be most carefully watched, and I do not believe that if a strong case were made, such as I have been able to make in reference to putting on countervailing duties in India where undoubted by bounty-fed sugar from Ger-nearly crushed a vast national industry, that any Government would have much difficulty in getting the House of Commons to assent to the proposition.

I have detained the House too long, but I have only one thing more to say, and I say it to my hon. friends on this side of the House as well as to the other side. I am very sorry to be in disagreement with the majority of my Party on this question. All who have gone through that process know that however kindly meant the cheers of former opponents may be, they are no consolation for the loss of the esteem of one's old friends, but I rejoice to think that protection is not to be at the next election the Party cry of the Conservative organisation. I am old enough to recollect when I first stood for Parliament what the impression made upon the working classes was in that great contest which resulted in the abolition of the Corn Laws. Protection is a good starter but it is a bad finisher. The moment the flag of protection is raised all those who have failed, and all those who can get anything out of it, at once simultaneously hasten to its flag, but there are vast latent forces and a large number of quiet persons who do not ordinarily take part in our contests who have succeeded on a system of free imports, and who will assert themselves in a way which is very remarkable when the polling day comes; moreover, I speak as an old electioneerer, it is a fatal mistake, however apparently popular your Party may be, to put in the mouths of your opponents arguments which are either unanswerable or are extraordinarily effective with the great mass of the people. For what can an opponent of protection at once say? He says "Do you approve of a system by which a man is returned to Parliament to benefit himself by taxing others." It is a simple, and if you like, a brutal formula, but it is effective in every form or shape, and in view of the fact that few electors can be Members of Parliament and all are taxpayers they feel very much the force of observations of that kind. I believe in a Party system, and I rejoice that the Government are beginning to assert themselves, as I understand, and to make their will felt on this question. The Party system is only workable if the head dictates the policy. The policy should govern the machine and the machine should never be allowed to dictate the policy. The result of the inaction and dilatory tactics employed by the Prime Minister has been, as we all know, that their control and power over the organisations has become less and less, and those organisations have been asserting themselves in a way which I say unhesitatingly will, if it goes on, tend to produce a political disaster in this country. I make every allowance for the difficulties of the situation, and I am prepared to make sacrifices to the organisations on whose efficiency I believe rests the moral and material welfare of our country. That being the feeling which animates these people how much the more must it affect the Prime Minister when he has to deal with controversies such as those which arose last summer. Therefore, I make all allowance for the Prime Minister. I think he was perfectly justified in making use of his rare diplomatic powers, and I can understand that he is justified in using his great powers of diplomacy and finesse in this direction. I think he was justified in trenching upon his own personal convictions if he believed that by delay he could keep in efficient working order the organisation in which he is the gifted chief. Those tactics have failed, and I could not help thinking that the clear and manly utterances to which the President of the Board of Trade gave expression last night were an indication that the wiser heads in the Government had come to that view. If in the continuance o this debate other speakers maintain the attitude and endorse the statements made to us by the President of the Board of Trade, we have gained very great concessions. If I can be assured definitely by subsequent speakers that that opposition to a tax on food is based not on tactics, but on principle, and if I am further told that they will have nothing to do with this protective 10 per cent. duty, then I think that the differences between us are very small. If a clear and definite statement to that effect is made, and if the Government policy is brought down to its very small dimensions, and freed of all those excrescences and extravagances which the unauthorised programme tacks on to it, then, although I am in entire accord with every word of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, I could not vote against the Government. I have no desire whatever, although I agree with right hon. Gentlemen opposite, to see them oust my friends from that Bench, but what will assuredly oust my friends from that Bench, and what will assuredly bring disaster and ruin upon our great political Party, will be a continuance of the dilatory tactics of the last six months, and, therefore, I do implore them—I hope I will not give any offence to my old friends—to screw up their courage and to put their foot down, and even go further than the President of the Board of Trade, and repudiate protection in all its aspects.

SIR JAMES KITSON (Yorkshire, W.R., Colne Valley,) said he had been for a very long time connected with the iron trade, which had been prominently mentioned in the discussion of the fiscal question, as one of the industries which was threatened. He had completed now nearly fifty years of active service, and, like the Parliamentary Secretary, he had had some experience in the manipulation of steel. He thought that his experience was somewhat more extensive than his hon. friend's. The Parliamentary Secretary had dealt at length with what people had said on the free-trade question; but he ventured to say that Cobden in his wildest dreams never thought that this country would build up its present magnificent condition of manufacture and commerce. The Parliamentary Secretary had wandered into small points about steel in order that he might make large percentages. He would deal with the general figures of the trade with regard to which it was news to him that it was not successful. That, he said, was news to him at the end of a long career, the latter years of which had, to his mind, been the better years of the half century. What the House of Commons had to deal with was the whole tenor and volume of the trade and industry with which he was connected. All branches of the iron and steel exports in 1880 amounted to £32,700,000, and in 1903 they had increased to £55,100,000. If they turned to the returns of the income-tax in the Blue-book, they would find that the assessment of the trade from 1892–7 ranged a little under and a little over £2,000,000; but in 1900 it rose to £3,000,000, 1901 to £5,000,000, and in 1902 this alleged declining and decaying industry was rated at £6,600,000.

*MR. BONAR LAW: I presume the hon. Member is aware that the returns to which he alludes relate only to pig-iron.

SIR JAMES KITSON replied that that was why he was alluding to the point. He was astonished at the smallness of the figure recorded. He wrote to the Board of Trade, and received a letter from Mr. Llewellyn Smith, who said that the figures given under the heading "Iron Works" represented, generally speaking, the profits of that section of the iron trade which was concerned with the smelting of the ore, whether such profits arose from smelting, or smelting carried on conjointly with other industries such as coal mines, etc. Yes; but coal was used in the manufacture of pig-iron. But did not the Parliamentary Secretary see that on this one section of the trade there was a return of £6,600,000. The total figures of the iron trade, estimated by competent authority, indicated that there was a turnover of £150,000,000 annually. He would venture to say that if they were to collect the income-tax returns from this trade, they would find that it was not £6,600,000, but nearly £20,000,000 at which the trade was rated for income-tax. What had been the advance in wages? He took the other day the rate of wages paid in his engine-works forty years ago. For fitters, moulders, pattern makers, smiths, and platers, the average rate of wages in 1860 was 28s. 3d. weekly; and in 1903 it was 37s. 9d., being an advance in the rate of wages of 9s. 6d. weekly. But that was not all. In 1860, the hours given were sixty per week; in 1903 they were fifty-three per week. That was not all—there was the increased purchasing power of money to-day. They were told that these changed conditions were owing in large measure to the action of the trades unions. No doubt the trades unions had been able to force the position; owing to their combination they had been able to obtain a large advance of wages; but that, of course, would have been impossible unless the condition of things and the advance in trade had enabled that trade to pay it. Just in support of his statement that employment had been abundant, and that the iron trade had been active, he would quote from a Government Report which had been circulated recently to both Houses of Parliament on the East Indian Railway. The Director-General of Stores in the India Office reported—

> "That the period covered, viz. three years, 1900, 1901, 1902, was certainly one of the worst that they had experienced for many years in getting prompt delivery of goods. As they were well aware, there had been a great boom in engineering work in this country. Every shop of importance was full of work, and materials were only procurable at the expense of considerable delay."

That he knew from his own experience was a matter of common knowledge. But to-day the iron trade was said to be declining. Last year (1903) the total make of pig-iron was 8,750,000 tons, and that quantity had only been exceeded in one year when it was a little over 9,000,000 tons. The United States, notwithstanding its enormous production, was not giving as much iron per head of the population as this country was producing at this time. The iron and steel trade was a trade which was essentially based on free imports. It was considered by everyone as an indigenous trade; but, as a matter of fact, out of the 21,000,000 tons of iron ore required for this production of pig-iron 7,000,000 tons were brought in from abroad. Where were the Government going to begin? Were they going to place a tax on iron ore? Well, that was raw material, and that, of course, was admitted to be impossible; but he could not help remarking on the patriotism of the Duke of Devonshire in taking the line he had done when his own interest as a great manufacturer of steel, and as the possessor of native ore, would lead him to throw in his lot with the retrograde policy which had been advocated on the other side. Now the question of the manufacturing capacity was very well measured by the quantity of coal which we raised per head of the population. The United States, notwithstanding its enormous output of 263,000,000 tons, only produced 3⅓ tons per head of the population, while the United Kingdom produced 5½ tons per head of the population. He could hear someone say, "Oh, yes, but we export 46,000,000 tons of coal." There were 46,000,000 tons of coal exported, and if that amount was deducted from our production we still had 4½ tons of coal per head of the population for home manufacturing processes. As to the production of pig-iron: in the year 1902 the United Kingdom produced 8,500,000 tons of pig-iron; and the imports of pig-iron were 227,000 tons, and of finished iron and steel expressed in terms of pig-iron, on which the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade laid so great stress, 1,260,000 tons—or a total of 10,000,000 tons. What did we do with these? We exported of pig-iron 1,102,000 tons; of steel and finished iron 2,800,000 tons; machinery, 524,000 tons; wire and tools, 200,000 tons—a total export of 4,626,000 tons—the balance of 5,374,000 tons being retained at home for the use of our shipbuilders, for engineering, machine making, and all the rest of it. This showed a magnificent home trade based on our imports of raw material. A very striking point which he would like to emphasise had reference to the public stores of pig-iron in the United Kingdom which they were constantly referred to. In 1887 there were 2,500,000 tons in store, whereas in 1902, when we had imported all this material, there were only 255,000 tons in store. If it had not been for that importation of pig-iron and raw steel there would have been actually a dearth of materials for our great shipbuilding and engineering establishments and we would not have been able to employ a large amount of high-priced labour. He thought that, in these days, it was vain to imagine that such a policy as had been advocated would not be disastrous to the great constructive trades of the country. It was our interest to get as much raw material as possible on which men who were paid high wages could work, and that our trades should be more widely spread.

Now, whence did this demand for protection arise? He did not deny that some branches of the steel trade had suffered; some had been almost extinguished. But that had been caused by the progress of invention. Steel rails produced by the Bessemer process were much more durable and were ultimately produced at a much cheaper price than under the old process. A Bessemer steel rail had a life three or four times that of an iron rail, and therefore the demand for the latter necessarily fell. Therefore the old puddling furnaces and rolling mills were destroyed. That was very unfortunate for the owners of these mills. The hon. Gentleman the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade had, with his family, greatly to their credit, done something in fostering the adoption of the Bessemer process; and no greater benefit had been conferred upon the world than the introduction of that process. No fewer than 9,000,000 tons of Bessemer steel ingots had been produced in one year in the United States, and he had heard an American gentleman say that the benefits conferred on the United States by the introduction there of the Bessemer process were equivalent to a sum which would have paid off their National Debt. Of course the community at large had benefited although the unfortunate sufferers were those who cried out for protection. Again, the introduction of the open-hearth steel process had destroyed the iron boiler-plate and the iron ship-plate trade; but it had enabled all those magnificent structures, battleships, merchant ships and the like, to be constructed at a capacity and a price which would have otherwise been impossible. He had been speaking only that day to Sir William White, late Chief-Constructor to the Navy, who told him that, but for the invention of the open-hearth process, it would have been impossible to make the constructions we had produced of late years. Although the boiler and ship-plate trade and the puddling furnace trade had been destroyed, the community at large had benefited. Were they going by protective duties to maintain these ancient processes?

A great deal had been said about dumping of steel billets and steel bars from Germany and from America. In 1902 the total amount of unwrought steel introduced into this country was only 280,000 tons, a mere bagatelle compared with the 10,000,000 tons to which he had referred. He would tell the reason why these billets and bars were dumped. The ancient process was to cast the pig-iron from the furnace into the sand. The "pigs" were allowed to grow cold; they were then reheated, melted in the converter, the ingots cast and allowed to grow cold. Then the ingots were reheated and rolled in the mills into bars and billets. The modern method now was, by a very ingenious device, to run out the metal from the blast furnace into a huge ladle, from which it was poured into a great vessel called a mixer, containing perhaps 150 tons, and thence to the converter, from which the ingots were cast. These were carried by an electric crane to the soaking pits and thence to a close chamber, and next picked up, placed in the rolling mill and converted into bars. There was no reheating, the natural heat was conserved, and repeated handling was saved. How was the man who had not got these new devices to compete with the man who had? Were they going by protective duties to foster and maintain the old processes which wasted the great forces of nature? Were these provided for the service of man to be wilfully cast away? Great Britain was not devoid of works where these improved processes were carried on. We were a little behind the rest of the world, but were not quite so slow as we were sometimes represented to be. He was represented in his constituency by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, whom he had met on other neutral occcasions, such as the meetings of the Chamber of Commerce. He had always admired the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had refused to take a pessimistic view of British commerce. He commended the right hon. Gentleman for that. He, a trader, also refused to adopt the policy of decrying his own wares. He was a member of a great trade, and he refused to discredit it. He believed, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, that those men who were continually coming to Parliament whining for assistance were mistaken. We must rely on our own energy and on our own resources, and then, he was convinced, we should still continue to be, as in the past, the first commercial nation in the world.

And it being half-past Seven of the Clock, the debate stood adjourned till this Evening's Sitting.

EVENING SITTING.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth :—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

Which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words —But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population ; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

Sir James Kitson.

Mr. RICHARD CAVENDISH (Lancashire, North Lonsdale) said as one of the Members who had consistently supported the Government during the whole period he had been in the House, and who had without hesitation followed the bidding of the Whips, he felt he could not support the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite without giving the reasons which prompted him to take that step. It might be said that after the speech of the President of the Board of Trade on the previous day it was hardly necessary for a free-trader to give any reason for voting in favour of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It was not possible, now that this issue had been raised, for any hon. Member to stand aside and not take a decided part on one side or the other. It might be said by some that the speech of the President of the Board of Trade had completely disposed of the allegation that the Government were moving in the direction of a protectionist doctrine. It was true that the right hon. Gentleman had repudiated any idea of protection, and he went on to say that the Government, as a Government, refused to associate themselves with the policy of the right hon. Member for Birmingham. That was a declaration which many hon. Members who were free-traders considered sufficient to enable them to support the Government, but there was one very serious omission from the right hon. Gentleman's speech. The right hon. Gentleman had not dealt with the condition the country had been in during the last four months, and never attempted to explain the attitude of the Government during the recess, from the opening of the right hon. Member for Birmingham's proposals and the present time. Some better explanation of the action of the Government ought to be given than had been vouchsafed. The House ought to know clearly and distinctly if the Government were going to take their part in the crusade against this doctrine of protection. It was impossible to support the Government unless the House heard that they did not propose to maintain a quiescent attitude on the subject, but were prepared to take a public part in destroying this vicious doctrine which had come amongst them. He would not enter into the complicated questions which had been discussed that afternoon by experts from opposite sides of the House, which a layman could not be expected to do, but it was not difficult for a layman to form a true estimate of what was right and what was wrong. Speaking for himself—and he believed a large number of Members who could not be expected to have a great technical knowledge of this subject—he based his opinion on primary operations. What they had to consider was what had been the result of this system of protection when it was in force; what had been the benefits derived from its abolition, and what were likely to be the results if it were reimposed. He was absolutely opposed to any of the protectionist proposals that had been advocated by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, and he was also opposed to the policy of retaliation. Retaliation might not do the country any harm, and it was conceivable that in some cases it might possibly do good, but, having heard the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, did any one believe, if they assented to the proposals of the Government, they would not have imposed upon them in a very short time a complete set of protective tariffs? A retaliatory tariff on one or two articles might do good, but when it was eventually extended to all the articles imported into this country they would be at once brought face to face with protection. If the House once assented to this policy of retaliation it would not be able to withstand protection later on. In this case it was of the highest necessity that they should prevent the thin end of the wedge coming in at all. Holding these views, he did not see how he could conscientiously oppose this Amendment, and he did not see how the Government, if their views had been accurately and justly expressed by the President of the Board of Trade, could conscientiously oppose it. If it were possible to have a clear issue on the merits and demerits of free trade and protection, he was convinced a majority would go into the lobbies in favour of the system under which they now lived.

In July last, in a speech delivered at the Constitutional Club, the Prime Minister distinctly declared that a difference of opinion on the great fiscal problem should not be held to be against Party allegiance; that it should not be for one side to question the loyalty of the other. But that declaration had not been acted up to in the last few months. Those who had adopted the free-trade platform had been held up as disloyal to their Party, to their own constituencies, and their own supporters, and had been subjected to every conceivable kind of annoyance; and determined efforts had been made to get the local organisations to adopt resolutions against them. They ought to have a specific declaration from the Prime Minister and the Government that they were content to abide by what he believed would be their wish if they were really a free-trade Government. The Government ought to extend to the free-traders the same consideration and support as they had extended to the Unionist candidates at the recent by-elections, who, while they advocated their loyalty to the policy of the Prime Minister and the Conservative Party, had stated their willingness, when the time came, to support the policy of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. He felt it was impossible for anyone who believed in the principle of free trade to take the declaration of the Government on free trade and not believe there was some hidden meaning in the background. He did not think it was intended to put them in a better position in the future, and until he had some better explanation from the Government he could not extend his support to them. It was impossible, with the views he held, to support a Government which he believed were taking a wrong course.

Mr. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) said he regretted to find himself in disagreement with an hon. friend with whom he had worked in harmony for many years, but his views did not coincide with those of the hon. Member who had just sat down. He was not a free-trader; on the contrary, to use the picturesque language which had been used in the debate, he was a "whole-hogger," and as he had supported the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in the country, he was not ashamed to support it in this House. The Amendment was divided into two parts, the first referred to the so-called conflicting statements of Ministers. In a case of this kind he regarded the statements of Ministers as somewhat of the academic order, because Ministers had publicly stated that they did not mean to introduce any change in the fiscal policy during the present Parliament. No doubt fiscal reform would come, but at the present the Government were advocating a policy called retaliation. One would have thought everybody might have agreed on retaliation. Even the Free Food League, he thought, would have supported retaliation, and he was rather surprised to hear that the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was going to vote in favour of the Amendment and against retaliation on the present occasion. While he accepted retaliation, he accepted it as a stepping-stone and in no other sense, because he did not believe that retaliation alone was a possible policy. He did not understand how there could be retaliation without a general tariff. The manufacturers would never allow a temporary retaliatory or protective duty to be put on some articles which they did not manufacture and not on others which they did manufacture. Besides which, retaliation would not meet the principal evil with which they wished to deal. At the present moment the principal thing with which they had to deal, as was shown by the remarkable speech of the Secretary to the Board of Trade, was not hostile tariffs but dumping, and how was retaliation to deal with dumping, which was the act of a private individual, firm, company, or cartel — whichever it might be called. He, for one, did not see how they were going to retaliate on private enterprise, or on the great evil of dumping. Again, dumping was confined to manufacturers. Did any hon. Member suppose that the agriculturists of this country would allow a system to be adopted which would benefit and temporarily protect a particular manufacturer and which would do nothing for agriculture? He did not believe it. And, lastly, the system of retaliation alone left out of count altogether the colonial position. He knew many people in the country, who, although they were free-traders economically, did not regard this question from an economic point of view, and were prepared to abrogate their free-trade principles on account of the enormous political advantages that would be derived from a preferential tariff between the Colonies and the mother country. Retaliation left out of consideration colonial and Imperial sentiment, and for that reason he did not believe it could be a permanent policy. He emphatically supported the Government so far as they went, because their action on retaliation alone marked a transition from, and a break with, the Cobdenite tradition of the last sixty years. The Prime Minister at Sheffield asked himself the question, "Do you wish to break with the tradition of the last half century," and answered the question emphatically in the affirmative "I do." That was the impression left on his mind after that speech, and he, as a tariff reformer, welcomed the break, and would be glad to think some alteration was to be made in the laissez faire attitude that had prevailed in this country for so long.

The second part of the Amendment spoke of the great advantage free trade or free imports had had upon the trade of this country for the last half century, and proceeded to warn them against any alteration in the system. He was prepared to admit that the system of free imports had contributed to some extent to the prosperity of the country; he admitted that there had been an enormous development in our prosperity since the abolition of the Corn Laws. But, in his opinion, supporters of that policy attached an over-rated importance to the fact that that was due entirely to free imports. At the time the Corn Laws were abolished railways were being constructed in this country, gold was being discovered, and we were engaged in building railroads all over the world; steam was being applied to machinery of various kinds in a way in which it had never been applied before, and because there was a large development of trade, it did not follow that post hoc was propter hoc and that all our prosperity was due to the duties abolished at that time. In 1846, when the present system was introduced, we were the workshop of the world; we had an absolute lead and were ahead of every foreign nation. We had progressed since then, but had not protected nations progressed much more than we? We were no longer the workshop of the world. The proportion of manufactures which we exported as against that which was exported by other countries was far less every year. We were now told that we were prosperous because our exports had increased last year by £7,500,000, but in the case of Germany, a protected country, their exports had been increased in nine months by £12,000,000. So that their exports had increased by £5,000,000 more than ours in three months less. It was absolutely true as years went on that the proportion of British exports, as compared with the exports of the whole world, grew less, and were it not that there had been a large increase in the exports of this country to the Colonies, he did not doubt that they would possibly show a decrease. The increase of the colonial trade had to a large extent concealed for a time the decrease in trade between this country and foreign countries. The Colonies had stepped in at the very moment when foreign nations by a high tariff had been refusing to accept British goods. That was not all. His hon. friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, in his extremely able speech, pointed out how the character of our trade had altered for the worse, and how we were exporting more and more raw materia land importing more and more manufactured goods. On the other hand, the imports of raw materials were declining and the imports of manufactured goods from foreign countries were increasing. Was that a good thing for this country? They might be extremely rich, they might have an enormous volume of trade, but they were employing foreign labour instead of English labour, and were sending capital abroad instead of employing it at home.

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose Burghs said he would be told that circumstances had entirely changed since free imports were introduced in 1846. He himself ventured to say that that was absolutely the fact. He was not one of those who went about the country abusing Cobden, and he did not know whether he would be considered as one of those who were unworthy to loose the latchet of Cobden's shoe. He had never held any other opinion of Cobden than that he was an exceedingly patriotic man and that he did what he believed to be the best at the time. He went further and said that he believed that Cobden's policy was not a bad policy at the time it was adopted. Cobden's object was to increase exports by throwing our ports open to raw material and food from abroad, so that the foreigners who sent us these articles should buy our manufactured goods. We were the workshop of the world at that time and did not fear hostile tariffs. Foreigners manufactured so little themselves that they were bound to buy from this country. This country then did not fear dumping because foreigners had nothing to dump. Circumstances had now, however, entirely changed. Foreigners did not see why they should continue to send this country food and raw material and take British manufactures, and they said that they would manufacture themselves. They now not only supplied their own markets but dumped goods on this country, to its great injury. Surely it was a wise policy to look at the effects of the changes which had taken place, and if an alteration in policy were inecessary, then to make it. He could not agree that because Cobden's policy was a good policy fifty years ago it was a good policy at the present time. He had heard a great deal the other day about dumping from an American. They did not call it dumping in America; they called it "making a slaughter market." It was said that dumping was bad for the country that dumped, but it was not necessarily bad if, as his hon. friend had pointed out, it enabled the country to increase its output, and thereby manufacture more cheaply. Then it was said that dumping was good for this country, because goods could be sold more cheaply than would otherwise be the case. If such cheapness were to be permanent it might be good. Did his hon. friend the Member for the Isle of Wight believe that that cheapness would be permanent or that industries were not destroyed by dumping? His hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn said that industries would revive, but what about the employés during the period of revival. They would be walking about without work and on the verge of starvation, and would possibly have to emigrate to other countries. Even then what would be the use of their returning, as if dumping recommenced the industry might be again destroyed. Already the glass and chemical industries had been very seriously injured. His hon. friend said that those industries were destroyed by foreign competition, but if goods were sent to this country at less than cost price then it was dumping and nothing else.

MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston) asked if the hon. Gentleman said that Belgian plate glass was sent into this country at less than cost price?

MR. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN said it was impossible across the floor of the House to answer questions about particular industries.

MR. MOULTON said that the profit on the Belgian plate glass industry was derived from exports.

MR. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN said that if the price were not below cost now it was possibly because the English plate glass industry had been destroyed and that the Belgians held the market. He had heard a great deal about the transferability of labour. A more heartless doctrine had never been pronounced in this House. It caused a vast amount of misery, and if there were any case where it was justifiable for the Government to interfere, it was the case where men were turned out of work by foreign dumping. Even if transferability were possible, a vast amount of suffering was absolutely inevitable. They were told they should have more technical education. Let them suppose that a man was technically educated to be a tinplate maker, and that owing to dumping that industry was temporarily destroyed. What was the use of technical education to such a man, brought up to a particular trade, when his work was taken from him, his trade destroyed, and he was told to seek other employment. He yielded to no hon. Member in his desire to see more technical education in the country, but they should supplement technical education by some means which would enable them to look after their own industries. They had, of course, heard of the old argument of the cheap and the dear loaf, and of the large and the little loaf. He quite agreed that that was a very effective argument to put before the electors; but it was a very misleading and a very unfair argument to suggest that a small duty of 2s. on foreign corn was going to raise the price of bread or reproduce the conditions that existed under the old Corn Laws. After all, there was a great deal to be said for the argument that cheapness was of no particular value unless a man had money to buy, and that employment was more important than cheapness. What they should aim at was more employment, and more regular employment, at better wages. He had heard it stated that under protection wages would be lower. He did not hold that view for a moment. He believed that any system which would be to the advantage of the home producer would have the inevitable effect of increasing wages, and if wages increased, even though there was a small increase in the cost of commodities, the position of the working class would be better off than it was now. He would give one illustration. Germany was a country which had tried both free imports and protection, and he had been able to trace in the case of one great firm—Krupps at Essen—what the wages were under both systems. From 1854 to 1873 there was a system of moderate protection in Germany, and the average wages in Krupp's works during that period was from 1·33 to 3·39 marks per day. From 1873 to 1878 there were free imports and wages fell from 3·39 to 3·31 marks per day.

MAJOR SEELY (Isle of Wight) said it was obvious that wages would fall when the sudden demand for guns ceased after the conclusion of a very great war. Other conditions came in later.

MR. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN said it was very remarkable that the other conditions were free imports. In 1879, when protection was introduced, wages rose from 3·09 marks in that year to 4·52 marks. which was the rate of wages last year; and during that period the cost of commodities had fallen, and the purchasing power of the German workmen had largely increased. He did not say that that was a conclusive argument; but he did say it justified them in the confident expectation that a system which secured their own markets, would have the effect of increasing wages and the purchasing power of the working man.

With reference to the colonial or Imperial side of the question the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose suggested that it was dead, or at any rate, that it had retired to the background. He wished to say so far as he and his friends were concerned that was not the case in the least. The colonial side of the question appealed most to him, and he was prepared to take the opinion of the House and the country on it. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to point out that this country would stand to lose very heavily by a system of colonial preference, and he said that the Colonies had very little to give. He himself disputed both propositions. He did not believe that if they developed the wheat fields of Canada the price of corn would be one penny more than it was at present. His right hon. friend the Member for Ealing said that the amount which their foreign rivals had of colonial trade was very small. But if they established a system of preferential trade with the Colonies, they would vastly develop colonial trade, and instead of sending capital to foreign countries they would be able to develop Canada and Australia, increase the population in those colonies, and increase the demand for British commodities. The Premier of Ontario speaking of Mr. Chamberlain's policy—he was in favour of it like every other public man in Canada—said the other day—

> "The only thing is, that this policy ought to have been adopted some years ago. If it had been adopted twelve years ago, the population of Canada, instead of being 6,000,000, as now, would be 20,000,000."

Canada took per head of British goods £5 worth per annum. If there were fourteen additional millions of Canadians at the present time the export of British goods to that country would be £70,000,000 more per annum than at present. He had no doubt that the policy which had been proposed would greatly develop the Colonies and be the very best thing that could happen for manufacturers at home. He was astonished at the attitude some hon. Members took up on this question of colonial preference. Cobden himself wished to get rid of the Colonies, and thought that free trade would get rid of them. Fortunately that prediction was proved to be false. Let them take the case of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. No one would for a moment suggest that he was animated by anything but the highest spirit of patriotism and Imperialism, and yet he seemed absolutely afraid of colonial preference. He seemed to think that if we came to some sort of arrangement with our colonies we should begin breaking up instead of consolidating the Empire. If we tried to force preference on our Colonies against their desire we might be going the right way to destroy the Empire, but the demand for preference came from the Colonies themselves and not from us, and no one would for a moment suppose that the unanimous resolution of the Premiers of the self-governing Colonies was forced upon them by the ex-Colonial Secretary. Not only had the Colonies requested preference, but several of them—Canada, South Africa, and New Zealand—had already given it, and the main issue between political parties in the last Australian elections was the refusal of the Government to go as far in this direction as their opponents desired. This offer, too, was being made to us at the very time that every foreign nation was closing its doors to our trade. Markets in nearly every part of the world were being shut to us, and were we to be such slaves of economic pedantry as to refuse to consider the arguments now put forward? Were we at the time that our trade was being diminished all over the world to lose the only opportunity of extending it? This question might be misunderstood, it might be overlaid with catch-penny phrases, such as free food, but he felt sure that when the time came for a clear issue to be laid before the country the policy of change so ably and so enthusiastically advocated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would be bound to succeed.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe) said the last speaker had left them in no doubt as to his position, but he need be under no fear that the question would be misunderstood; the longer it was discussed the better the people at large understood it. They all welcomed the plain, straightforward and manly speech of the hon.

Member for North Lonsdale, a member of a great historic family. If anything were needed to justify the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose in bringing forward his Amendment it was to be found in the course the debate had taken. They had had some most interesting speeches. The discussion was absolutely necessary, and it would have been a dereliction of duty if the Opposition had not challenged the opinion of the House on this subject. They had already had four speeches from members of Cabinet and ex-Cabinet rank. First there had been the remarkable declaration of the President of the Board of Trade; then they had had a no less remarkable speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol; next they had had the contribution of the noble Lord the late Secretary of State for India, and finally they had had the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, raising important points to which as yet no reply had been given. This House was the grand inquest of the nation; it was its duty to investigate this matter, and he was astonished at the entire absence through long periods of Cabinet Ministers. Such conduct in former days would have been held to justify a Motion for Adjournment. More explicit information was required from the Treasury Bench. The Secretary to the Board of Trade, whose intervention was delightful in everything that made speech attractive, had appeared as a full blown protectionist, and yet, on the previous night, his chief repudiated any doctrine of the kind. He had said with great truth that some of the questions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton could only be replied to by the Prime Minister, but surely, even though, unfortunately, the Prime Minister was prevented from being present, there was some Minister who could speak with the voice of authority and declare the position of the Government? Could not the Cabinet meet and draw up a Memorandum and entrust it to the Home Secretary to read? Let some one be empowered to state explicitly and clearly the position of the Government. Still it was not with the Government that they had to deal for the moment. Everyone knew that the real protagonist was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. He (Mr. Ellis) had always recognised that he had ideals on the subject of Empire, and he had never thought that he put forward these doctrines and left the Cabinet from any but high motives. But he did think the right hon. Gentleman had been mistaken, and that some of his ways had been most reprehensible; still the right hon. Gentleman no doubt believed himself to be the missionary of truth and had indulged in what had been termed a raging tearing propaganda. He noticed one curious incident on the first night of the session. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to find fault with the Leader of the Opposition for alluding to the author of this policy, and said he did not know it had ever before happened on the opening night that so much attention had been paid to a private Member. But the matter was not to be brushed aside in that fashion. The Times had remarked—

> "Mr. Chamberlain's policy is not a Parliamentary question at all. Some of us sympathise with his efforts to convert the country, but until he does convert the country no one can give effect to his sympathy."

Surely the first place in which this subject should be discussed was the Commons House of Parliament. Hon. Members were bound to maintain on the floor of the House what they had said outside.

The first fault he found with the policy propounded by the late Colonial Secretary was want of recognition of history. The last speaker, like so many, seemed to think that the matter began and ended with Richard Cobden. Long before Richard Cobden lived the principles of free trade were enunciated, and it was not because Cobden believed that other countries would follow our example that he agitated for the abolition of the Corn Laws; it was because he believed it would be for the benefit of these islands. Let hon. Members devote a little more time to the study of Hansard, and they would find that long before Cobden's day the principles of free trade were advocated by statesmen, and it was a policy accepted by both political Parties from the great debate and division in 1852 down to May last year. The onus therefore rested on those who wanted to put back the hands of the clock, and who believed in proection, to prove their case. The right hon.

Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham appeared to forget that every single argument he had used was demolished over and over again in the debates which occurred in that House a generation or two ago. Whenever the arguments advanced were reduced to specific instances and definite calculations it was at once seen how illusory they were. He understood the President of the Board of Trade had rather given up the theory of decaying trades. [AN HON. MEMBER: Where is he?] Here and there they might find in certain industries a particular concern which was not very flourishing and not paying a high rate of interest to its shareholders, but that arose from a cause which had not been sufficiently recognised. That cause was the operation of the Companies Acts, by which the old individual personal management had been lost. The new management had not improved in quality. The boards of directors, many of them composed of gentlemen not brought up to the business, but who had simply invested their money with a view to getting a higher rate of interest, were not in close touch with the business or the employés. Besides that, many of these concerns had had their capital inflated to an absurd extent. He believed that company management was responsible for a good deal of the complaints of bad trade. He had a curious illustration of that the other day. A clergyman came to him and said, "I think there must be something in this scheme of Chamberlain's for I am going to get 10 per cent. on my investment instead of 5 per cent." On inquiry he found that the money was invested in a concern which he knew very well. It dealt in a commodity in universal demand, and formerly belonged to a family which made great fortunes; but it had now passed into the hands of a company, the capital in it had been quadrupled, it had a very inefficient board of directors, and, of course, could not pay a good dividend. It was that sort of concern which it was hoped the Birmingham scheme would benefit. The only people who had been bitten by this scheme of 10 per cent. duties were a number of manufacturers who, here and there, were not in the first rank of their industries, and some of whom, he knew, were on the Tariff Commission. He remembered sitting as a youth in the gallery and hearing the introduction of the Budget of 1860, when Mr. Gladstone said—

> "We are all without exception free-traders, but none of us are free-traders without an exception, and the exception is always in favour of ourselves."

These gentlemen all thought they were going to get something out of the scheme, but when they came to the question of what each was to pay, then would arise the difficulty.

It was also said that there was to be some advantage to agriculture. Certainly the agriculturists were not going to allow a tax to be enjoyed by manufacturers unless they got something out of it also. But he would like the right hon. Member for Sleaford, for example, to say what the farmer was going to get, to show a balance-sheet setting out what the duties would bring him and what he would have to pay for enchanced price of commodities, how much the landlord would get, and how much the increase of wages would be which was given to the labourers. In his judgment the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was crude to the last degree. It had not been carefully thought out, and it changed like a chameleon from day to day. But all the vices to which he had referred faded into insignificance beside the one great vice that it gave no recognition to the manifold variety and the enormous and delicate complexity of our commercial system. He had been astounded when responsible years ago as chairman of a bank at the delicate web and net-work which our commercial system had assumed. Why was it that not a single banker of repute sat on the Tariff Commission. The Times of that morning remarked that banking only deals in the "exchange and distribution," but surely these elements were a large and vital portion of our commercial life? All the speeches which had been made, from the right hon. Gentleman downwards, were lacking in the accent of personal responsibility and experience in affairs. Business firms with which he was connected had received the list of questions the Commission were asking, but was it to be supposed that replies would be sent to persons of no authority, and who had no right to put the questions? The whole thing was more or less of an imposture. What lay at the root of this whole scheme of fiscal reform was the artificial enhancement of the cost of living of the people of this country. He regretted the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, but it was necessary to consider at whose instance the scheme was put forward. The right hon. Gentleman's public career was not such as to give authority to the pledges he had offered.

Coming back in conclusion to the Government, the President of the Board of Trade had left something to be desired in the matter of clearness by constantly interposing among his declarations as a Cabinet Minister his individual personal opinions. The House and the country were entitled to and must have, before the debate closed, some authoritative utterance on behalf of the Cabinet as to the precise position of the Government on one of the greatest matters that had arisen in our day. There were only two roads in connection with this question—the ancient road, which was forsaken sixty years ago, which entailed disaster and untold difficulties and hardship upon the people of this land, and the road along which, by the universal agreement of both Parties, the country had travelled since then. As a free-trader by conviction, and to a certain extent by heredity, nothing would induce him to consent to a scheme such as that which had emanated from Birmingham in so unprecedented a manner, and which he believed would conduce to nothing short of national disaster.

Lord HUGH CECIL expressed his profound regret that the debate on this question was held for the first time on such an occasion. It was impossible not to feel how much the Unionist Party, how much the Government itself, would have been spared if they had consented to give them what they asked for last session—the opportunity of debating without dividing, of merely interchanging opinions upon this great question, of eliciting from all sides the varying judgments of different shades of opinion upon the subject. They would have avoided, he was confident, the wide, the painful divisions which now tormented the Unionist Party. He suspected they would have been still a united Party, following a united Cabinet, instead of divided, listening to different voices and trying, amidst the confusion of an unprecedented situation, to find out what was the guidance of their leaders and what was the path of their own duty. In the present circumstances it was impossible not to speak to some extent for one's self, because when opinion was in its present state of flux, no one could tell whether they accurately represented the opinions of any one except themselves. Therefore, speaking strictly for himself, might he say one word as to the position he occupied in regard to this Amendment and in regard to the policy of the Government? He approached the subject, let him say at once, as a Conservative heart and soul. He was afraid some of his hon. friends would think it disloyal, or at least an undisciplined, avowal when he said that he held precisely the same political opinions to-day as he did twelve months ago. If we had, as the French had, the custom of describing things by a particular year, he would say he was a Conservative of 1895. He held to the full all the principles that were then maintained by the Conservative Administration which was returned to power in that year, and he was satisfied that those principles were still, as they were then, consistent with the doctrines of free trade. The second salient point of the position from which he was bound to approach this subject was that he was altogether convinced of the truth of the doctrines of free trade. He was assured by many people that his position was an impossible one—that nowadays one must be either a Radical or a protectionist, that there was no place in politics for those who did not fall into the one category or the other. It might be so, but he could not help that. He could not conceive anybody desiring to remain in political life except on their own terms. His terms involved, as an indispensable requirement, that he should be implicitly faithful to the principles both of Conservatism and of free trade. That being his point of view, what was the position to which it led him?

Though he agreed with almost everything the President of the Board of Trade said, he was not able to agree with him when he said that the policy proposed by the Member for West Birmingham was not the main issue before the country. He thought it was. It did not rest with the Government, it did not rest with any individual, however eminent, to decide what was the issue before the country. The Government could not make a thing an issue by saying it was the issue. They could not prevent a thing being an issue by denying that it was one. The question that was occupying the attention of the great mass of the people outside the House was, "Is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham right or is he wrong? Is his policy the salvation of the Empire and of British industry, or is it hurtful to the Empire and ruinous to British industry?" It was futile to pretend that anything else really occupied the mind of the country. When he addressed his mind to the policy of the Government, as it was stated by the President of the Board of Trade, his misgivings were not altogether removed. It was true that, as that right hon. Gentleman stated, the policy of the Government there was little if anything in it to which he objected on economic grounds. He did not object at all to the principle of retaliation, and he saw no reason for adhering to the maxim of a tariff for revenue only, supposing they could get the same good by a tariff for any other purpose; but he thought with his right hon. friend the Member for West Bristol that so far as retaliation went, it would have been very much better and more convenient if the Government had made any positive proposal which they had to make, now at once. He did not understand why they were to have a solemn novitiate before they entered upon this new policy. If it was for the sake of its heterodoxy he was afraid that his right hon. friend was perfectly aware that the Government two or three years ago took a step which, in point of heterodoxy, was a much stronger order than retaliation. Retaliation received honourable mention from so orthodox a writer as John Stuart Mill. The Government, with his full support, did a much more heterodox thing than retaliation by imposing an export duty on coal. But they never announced beforehand that they were going to reverse the fiscal system of the country. They simply proposed the duty: it was argued on its merits, and, a majority of the House having been convinced that it was a good proposal, it was adopted. Why could they not have done the same thing in regard to retaliation? Retaliation was a much greater reversal of the traditions of sixty years than an export duty on coal. As described by the right hon. Gentleman, retaliation was only a small modification of our fiscal traditions of sixty years ago. But there was another policy which was a reversal of those traditions. Was it possible to rid one's mind of the suspicion that this more moderate policy was called a reversal in order to use a term which would cover the two policies together, confuse the matter, and draw together into one scheme of political action free-traders and protectionists, who, though they disagreed, might, it was thought, co-operate for the success of the Government and their policy? He thought the Government were fairly exposed to that suspicion. He felt it all the more when he studied, not merely what they had said, but their words and actions during the past three or four months.

What distinction had been made between the policy which was now repudiated by his right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham and the official policy of the Government? What had anybody gained by being an official fiscal reformer, and what had anybody lost by being an unofficial fiscal reformer? How many people had made speeches from which it was quite impossible to infer whether they were official or unofficial fiscal reformers? He really thought that the only strictly loyal adherent to the Leadership of the Prime Minister was the Duke of Devonshire, for he had drawn a distinction between the official and the unofficial policy which was perfectly logical in its character. What was the effect upon the public mind if they saw election after election taking place and the organisation selecting a candidate who maintained the unofficial, the unauthorised, and now the repudiated policy, and if they saw that candidate blessed by the Prime Minister, given a watchword, and the whole force of the political organisation devoted to his return, while all the time he was advocating a policy to which the President of the Board of Trade, and, they presumed, the Prime Minister, were opposed? If such a candidate became the typical member of the Party of the future, both his right hon. friends must retire from office, or they were landed in this paradoxical situation—that they had all the official resources of the Government used to further a policy which would imply the retirement from official position of the leaders of the Party to which that Government belonged. But there was an instance of something stronger than paradox. That a Minister should go down and oppose a Conservative Member for the sake of a policy which his Leader had not adopted and which his colleague had now repudiated—should oppose one who had been a supporter of him so long as he was loyal to the faith of the Party; that, indeed, was a violation of all the traditions of Party government and of the best reputation of public life. Yes, and he saw his right hon. friend still sitting upon that Bench. He had not gone forth into the wilderness to preach a crusade in favour of the principles he upheld; he was content to stab in the back—[Cries of "Oh!" and OPPOSITION cheers]—those who were honestly trying to maintain their own opinion within the limits which the Prime Minister, whom he served, had declared to to be sufficient. Grateful as he was for the declaration of the President of the Board of Trade, and heartily as he agreed with almost every word of that declaration, he did not think it altered the main lines of the political situation. After all, what would happen supposing things went on as they had gone on during the last three or four months? He really thought his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade would be more uneasy than he was if he were less confident that the Opposition were going to win the next election. Supposing the policy of fiscal reform received the support of a majority of the next House of Commons. According to his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade the present Government would be precluded from proposing a preference or imposing a tax on food; they would be opposed to the policy of putting a 10 per cent. duty on manufactured goods; even in respect of retaliation he admitted that he saw difficulties in putting it into operation against Russia or the United States. What sort of enthusiasm would that kind of Government excite in the minds of the then majority of the House of Commons? He did not think such a Government would last long; he thought it would inevitably have to give place to another Government. Then, did we not reach this sort of conclusion—he did not see his hon. friend the Member for Bradford in his place, but, in the absence of that clear-minded creator of crystals he would say that a vote given for the Birmingham policy was a vote for driving the Prime Minister, the President of the Board of Trade, and all their colleagues who agree with them out of the Government. The Party organisations were choosing candidates in favour of the Birmingham policy; and if the Party under that régime achieved a success, the success would have as its immediate result the destruction of the Leader of the Party. That was a position so paradoxical that it embarrassed the Party to a point which must make it weak for all purposes of electoral fighting, and which must involve grave injustice to those who were honestly trying to take a course according to their consciences, but were not able to agree with the unauthorised policy. Not only pressure, but actual exclusion, had been practised, not only against free-fooders, but against those who were altogether supporters of the Government policy. His hon. friend the Member for Portsmouth he saw was unable to stand again for that constituency because he was not a supporter—not of the Government policy, but of the policy of the Member for West Birmingham. If the Birmingham policy, then, was not the issue, what was an issue? What had the Government done to prevent these things happening? He quite agreed that the speech of his right hon. friend was a new thing, and it marked, he hoped, a new step in the career of the Government; but previously even the most free-trade members of the Government thought it necessary to begin by sneers at Cobden, to talk about the necessity of reviewing our policy after an experience of sixty years, which might be true, but meant exceedingly little, conveying to listeners and readers the general impression that the Government were, after all, in their hearts thoroughly with the Member for West Birmingham, and all the time were ready to carry out his policy whenever they got the opportunity.

Turning to the question of how he ought to vote on the Amendment, he asked what would have been said if any other question than free trade had been treated in this ambiguous manner—for instance, Home Rule or disestablishment. His right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade had spoken of pious opinions. He might have taken as an illustration the opinions which the Member for West Birmingham, he understood, entertained in favour of disestablishment. Nobody complained of that view in the circumstances; but if the right hon. Gentleman had carried on a great mission in favour of disestablishment, if the Prime Minister had adopted a doubtful and ambiguous policy on Church reform, if the members of the Government had said they were heartily in favour of Church reform, but looked forward at no distant date to going on to the greater and wider policy of disestablishment, if one of the members of the Government was found on a Liberationist platform against some person who was a supporter of the Establishment—what would have been his feelings? Could any one doubt that he would have voted for anything and everything that would have expressed disapprobation of the attitude of the Government? He could not in any circumstances vote against the right hon. Gentleman whose Amendment was now before the House, because he agreed with every word of that Amendment. He did not attach much importance to the preamble, and the rest of the Amendment was merely a very moderate statement of the doctrine of free trade, of which everybody who called himself a free-trader must be a supporter. Therefore he could not vote against such an Amendment as that. Nor did he think the technical doctrine that the quality of the Amendment as a vote of censure was more important than its wording, could be allowed to stand in the way of a great issue like this. Members of Parliament must think of the impression this would produce. In the House they understood the value of those technicalities, but outside people did not know what was meant by an Amendment to the Address, but they understood if a proposal was put forward it was a proposal in favour of free trade, and they would say to their representative, "If you are a free-trader, why should you not vote for free trade." They must beware of being too subtle in these things and take one side or the other. They must adopt the natural straightforward course which would commend itself to plain people outside the House in carrying out the functions of a Member of the House of Commons. There remained two courses, that of abstention and that of voting for the Amendment. He did not intend to decide with actual finality at that moment between those two courses. He could not conceal from the House that abstention was a course very uncongenial to his temperament. He did not like to halt, or to seem to halt, betweeen two courses. He had often seen, in the case of persons very much more distinguished, the danger of doing so. He had watched the very skilful manœuvres of the Prime Minister during the last session, and he could not say he thought they were to his advantage or that of his Party. He had also watched the unskilful manœuvres, two years ago, of the Leader of the Opposition, and in his case also he thought they were not to the right hon. Gentleman's advantage. If he knew that the Government were really going to fight the battle of free trade against the Member for Birmingham and would act to the full up to the declarations of the President of the Board of Trade; if all through the Government would use the whole resources of Party discipline and Party organisation in order to retain retaliation and no more, then certainly he would be inclined to abstain from any course which might embarrass the Government.

With regard to retaliation, though he recognised the great difficulties in the way, he admitted that there was a strong case to be made in its favour. He was not what his right hon. friend felicitously called a Quaker in these things and he saw no reason for peace at any price. But he thought it would be well to have it known that we were prepared to retaliate if we were very badly treated. He was bound, however, to say that if the instances in which it had been used were examined, it did not seem to have produced very important results for good, and it had unquestionably done a great deal of mischief. He was told that those who supported the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham were called "whole-hoggers," while those who supported the Prime Minister were called "little-piggers." He believed that the Prime Minister's taste for pork was very delicate, and he thought he would probably have only a pig of the smallest dimensions; so that he could honestly say that he was a supporter of the policy of economic orthodoxy professed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister was one of those persons who liked to make themselves out a great deal more protectionist than they were, just as some people were always telling one, "What a devil of a fellow" they were in their youth. The right hon. Gentleman liked to have his gibe at old Cobden and the rest, but in point of fact he was a very steady-going, respectable citizen at heart. He wished in a more serious vein to say that if he found himself in the Opposition lobby when a division was taken, it did not indicate that he dissented from the general policy of the Government, or even from their economic policy as explained by his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade, and, least of all, that he had the slightest intention of modifying in any sense whatever his adherence to Conservatism as he had always understood it.

Passing to the merits of the policy put before them by the Member for West Birmingham, one rough observation applied to the industries which were supposed to be dying. It was that if one competent critic said an industry was in a bad state, and another that it was in a very good state, they would not be far wrong in assuming that it was really doing pretty well, but not so well as everybody might wish. Had the industries been really dying, the agitation this would have occasioned would have been so great that they would not have had to wait the return of the right hon. Gentleman from the illimitable veldt in order to know it. It was the highest compliment to his right hon. friend to say that his heart was really in the Imperial side of the subject, and it was only when he looked into the matter with the bias which the policy of preference suggested to him that the industries of England appeared to him to be in such a critical condition. They might, therefore, without unreason, be a little sceptical of this theory of ruined industries, which no one ever thought of until his ingenious, interesting, and important Imperial policy was put before the country.

Mr. DISRAELI (Cheshire, Altrincham) was understood to say these trade proposals were thought of twenty years ago.

Lord HUGH CECIL said that was very true. They were thought out long ago, very carefully considered, and altogether rejected. They were elaborately developed twenty years ago, and it was the right hon. Member for West Birmingham who, with his very distinguished talents, destroyed the agitation and maintained the fabric of free trade.

He turned therefore to the Imperial side of the question. What was it that was put before them? What end was it to serve? They were told that it made for the unity of the Empire, and they were asked whether they were willing to make sacrifices for so great an object. Certainly he would be, and all would be, willing to make important sacrifices for the unity of the Empire. The question therefore resolved itself into this, was this policy really one that made for the unity of the Empire. He regretted that in the speeches advocating the policy very little was said to show how that object would be effected by it. Would it prevent secession? It was said that was one of the objects it might lead to. He could not conceive of anyone supposing that the Colonies should be so excited and angry that they would break their sentimental ties and the associations of common patriotism which now bound them to the Empire, and that at the very moment of secession they would change their mind when they remembered that they were getting 2s. a quarter from this country on their wheat. Those who knew the history of the world knew the deep passions which alone produced these secessions, and they must be aware that if passion did rise to the height which would make secession a possibility, no preferential tariff would for an instant stand in the way? It would be like trying to bridle a great stream with a wisp of grass. It would be swept away and carried down into the sea by the resistless flood. Would this policy make for the unification of the Empire? That was what many people believed. He had tried to consider what history said on the subject. Was there any case in history in which such an arrangement had made for unification which could at all be compared with the present case? The case of Germany was often instanced, but after all what made the unity of Germany was not the Zollverein. The history of the unity of Germany depended upon a great many historical subjects. The highest patriotic sentiment was excited, but even then unity was not produced. Unity was finally produced not a little by the blood and iron of the Prussian Monarch. The unity of Germany was built round the ascendancy of Russia. There was no analogy between that and the present case. We were in a different position, and anything resembling force or coercion would be out of the question. How did the Zollverein in their case operate? It operated by taking away the barriers which stood in the way of a natural unity. Here there were natural frontiers, and a Zollverein was not proposed. The cases were so different that they could not argue from one to another. The instance of Scotland was also instructive. Scotland was undoubtedly made a contented country eventually by the fiscal terms which were arranged at the time of the Union. But the Union was not very successful from the national point of view, because it was so unpopular that it was directly the cause of two rebellions in fifty years. What made the Union successful was that its fiscal advantages were so great that it raised Scotland from poverty to great riches. Was anything like that likely in the case of the Colonies? Every one admitted that the Colonies were already highly prosperous, and whatever might be effected by the proposals of his right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham would make but slight difference to them. If they desired to see how slight the effect would be, let them consider the case of Ireland. Such was the force of racial, religious, and agrarian differences that Ireland was not united to England, despite all the preferential treatment in her interest. The truth was that these arrangements were in the nature of a bargain, and a bargain always led to disputes and hardly ever to unity. The case of Canada was also worth considering. Were we going to ask Canada to accept a larger number of British imports at a time that we were declaring that German imports into Great Britain were a curse? Was it intended to inflict upon Canada the sorrows which this country suffered from German imports? Were they going to deprive the Canadian people of their industries so that they would have to go into the workhouses, or migrate to the cold Western territory to till the fields. One might indulge in much rhetoric of the same kind if one had the time of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to deal with it. Thus, by the application of protectionist principles, they would have created a machinery which would promote Imperial disunion, although it was done in the name of Imperial union. The proposal was that we should impose imports on Canada while we resented them in our own case from the foreigner. We were at the same time to keep open ports for the Colonies. It was obvious that the English producer would very soon come to resent colonial imports. He would very soon begin to think that colonial imports were all that foreign imports were supposed to be. This would irritate and divide, and therefore the argument of unification could not stand. Then there was the argument of the colonial demand. But even that was not very strong. He should like to draw attention to a statement which had appeared in The Times of 2nd February from its correspondent in Australia in an account of the Australian elections. It was very remarkable coming from a source rather in favour of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birminngham. The correspondent said—

> "It must be apparent that a community so much in earnest about its fiscal future would not have withheld a single vote for free trade even if Mr. Chamberlain's preferential proposals had been before it for acceptance or rejection. But it was felt in New South Wales, as well as in the other States, that the preferential trade proposals of Mr. Chamberlain have not at present come within the range of practical politics. When the proposals do come up for separate consideration and decision the free-traders of New South Wales and the other States are much more likely to meet Mr. Chamberlain half-way than are the protectionsts. Notwithstanding Mr. Deakin's assurances that he will give a return to the mother country for preferential treatment of Australian products, the prospect that any reductions of our present duties will be made in favour of British manufacturers is extremely remote. Mr. Deakin may be willing to do this, but will the protectionist party support him? So far that party has not shown the slightest disposition to do so."

We found that our colonies were lukewarm on the subject, and that had removed from us the very last argument that could be made of Imperial sympathies in favour of the policy which was recommended.

He should like to ask finally what were we to think of a doctrine that had been put forward, notably at the Guildhall, as to the decay of Empire, and Spain and Holland had been mentioned. Certainly those countries had not fallen through free trade, and Spain retained her colonial empire till the beginning of the nineteenth century, long after she had lost her position as a great Power. One might make a contrast between England after she lost her American colonies, and Spain after she lost her position as a great Power. The true explanation was that the life at the centre remained unimpaired in Great Britain, but was gone in the case of Spain. Powers did not die from the circumference, but from the centre, and it was of what threatened the centre that we ought to be most afraid. He maintained that the policy of protection threatened the central life of a country in three ways. First, it led to extravagance, because it veiled the taxation necessary to meet growing expenditure under the pleasing guise of protection for home industries. Secondly, protection promoted profound social discontent, which was so notable a feature of almost every country on the Continent, and from which we were happily free. We had almost forgotten what it was like, but we knew it once. There was a time when the Chartist agitation was just the same to us as the Social Democratic agitation was to Germany; and the Chartist agitation, curiously enough, disappeared just about the time when we adopted free trade. Did anybody suppose that any benefit to the Empire could equal the evil caused to the whole Empire by the growing up of a revolutionary party in Great Britain? The third danger to the life at home was corruption. He had always supported reasonable and fair treatment to the great licensed victualling interest in this country; but he could not shut his eyes to the fact that a highly organised trade, having its pecuniary interests intimately bound up with the decisions of Parliament, was a very bad thing for political life. There was the instance also of a very large body of Government employés exercising pressure on Members of Parliament. If protection were adopted every trade, knowing that its wealth or poverty depended on the decisions of Parliament, would put all the pressure in their power on Members of Parliament to do them a good turn. He did not know whether corruption would take the extreme form of giving bribes, but corruption might be just as real and destructive to national life when it was a matter of log-rolling, pressure, and lobbying, which was so familiar a feature in protectionist countries.

There was behind this controversy another which had hardly come fully into the open, he should perhaps say a difference of opinion, which he believed to be very deep-seated, and to lie at the root of a good deal of the passion imported into the present discussion. There were, he believed, two Imperialisms. There was the Imperialism which looked only to profit, and that which had its spring in duty. The former looked on the Empire as a gigantic profit-sharing business, losing sight of those aspects of Empire which were its justification in other eyes. He should be sorry if we lowered our ideas of Empire. He repudiated from the bottom of his heart the counsels of those who would have us shrink from the necessary sacrifices, or from bold and even heroic courses when they were necessary. He believed Empire to be not merely a possession, but a sacred trust; and he liked to watch, as in Egypt and the Soudan, how the English brought good things to those who had been less blessed than themselves. But if the Empire were to be great, must we not wish that its great power should be exercised without the taint of corruption; that if its dominion were long, and its heart bold to endure all sacrifices, its mind also might be pure and its hands clean; and that it might go upon its path serene and majestic, driving before it all the evil things of anarchy and barbarism, and carrying in its train justice and civilisation and religion? So, indeed, we might justify Empire and believe that its part was a divine part—its sceptre the sceptre of righteousness, and its power the instrument of Heaven.

SIR THOMAS WRIGHTSON (St. Pancras, E.) said he listened with very great interest to the remarks made by the hon. Member for the Colne Valley Division. In that speech he described the complaints which were made by ironmasters as to the evils resulting from the importation of goods to be sold below cost price. He did not profess to have the long experience of his hon. friend, but he hoped he had sufficient knowledge of the subject to speak with a certain degree of authority upon it. The hon. Member for Colne Valley had spoken of the improved appliances made use of in Germany for the manufacture of iron and steel. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that in the works of which he was himself a director in the district of Middlesborough, and in which they manufactured the very goods which were being so heavily dumped at the present time, every one of these improvements had been carried out; and yet with the very best management possible they had not been able to manufacture their goods at the same price as the Germans. The same held good in Wales, where last year no less than 200,000 tons of steel bars were imported. In the North of England and the Midlands, as well as in Wales, they were able to manufacture these materials just as well as the Germans. They had the coal under the ground on which they stepped, they had the ironstone, and all the other raw materials, and it was incredible that they were not in as good a position to manufacture these goods as the Germans. The enormous amount of material coming into the Midlands, the Northern Counties, and Wales, would not be imported there if the local manufacturers had not made up their minds that it was impossible to compete with this dumping. The matter was as simple as possible. If they looked at the German papers they saw that the price of steel bars delivered in Wales was £4 per ton, while the price for the home market in Westphalia was £6 per ton.

MR. LOUGH: There is a duty on pig-iron in Germany.

SIR THOMAS WRIGHTSON said that there was a very heavy duty against British pig-iron, but the Germans could deliver the manufactured iron in England duty free, and that enabled them to charge a high price to their own people. In fact the Germans manipulated their prices in such a way as to get underneath the English market, and that was the real reason why dumping could take place. The question was—could the English manufacturers be expected to go on manufacturing at a loss? They would be very foolish if they did. They must go into another branch of trade or give up altogether. In his own particular work they had gone into another branch of trade, and in doing so they had to put down a large amount of capital, which came in before the ordinary share capital. There was considerable disorganisation of the trade in consequence of the change, and there was, therefore, great loss. These were some of the results of the dumping system. It was pretended by certain members of the community that the cheapness which was the result of the importations from Germany and America was a compensation to us, because it was a benefit to the consumer. It might be a benefit to the consumer temporarily, but what were the causes of the rise and fall of prices which alternately benefited the consumer and the producer? Those causes were obviously automatic in their action. If the manufacturer produced too much, the prices went down; if the prices went down so low that the manufacturers were discouraged from manufacturing more, the prices went up again. But the whole of this automatic action was altered if they allowed the introduction of articles at below cost price. To allow the foreigners to supply our markets and keep the price at an unremunerative rate was disastrous to the local manufacturer. The interest of the producer and the consumer should be identical. What would be the effect after the Germans and the Americans had taken entire possession of our markets? People said "Oh, there is no difficulty in that; if a lower grade trade is taken possession of by the foreigners, let our own manufacturers take possession of the higher grade." But if the foreigner was in possession of the lower grade, the native manufacturer of the higher grade would be entirely in the hands of the former, and the foreigner would immediately put up his price upon the manufacturer of the higher grade. In this way we would soon cease to be the great manufacturing nation that we now were, and we would look back with regret that we had not sooner adopted a policy to protect our industries. The policy of the Government meant that we should look after our own interests, because the greatness of our country was owing to our industries on which our commerce was based. It was on these grounds that he upheld very strongly the policy of the Government for the protection of our manufacturing industries, and the provision of employment for our working people.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Contracts for Shipment of Stores to Gibraltar.

Mr. PARTINGTON (Derbyshire, High Peak): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, having regard to the increased consignment of military and naval stores to Gibraltar since 1894, and to the fact that no tenders for transport of same have been invited since that date, he will now consider the advisability of permitting other shipping companies to tender for the contract in question.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The question has been carefully considered in consultation with the Admiralty shipping agents, and, in view of the terms of the present contract and the conditions of the Gibraltar trade, it is not considered that any advantage would be gained by inviting fresh tenders. The contract gives a regular weekly service, and has been carried out very satisfactorily.

Re-armament of Volunteer Artillery.

MR. SEYMOUR ORMSBY-GORE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): To ask the Secretary of State for War what steps are being taken towards the re-armament of the mobile batteries of the Artillery Volunteers.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) Forty-four batteries have been armed with the 4·7-inch gun—total 176 guns. The re-armament of the remaining eighty-one batteries with fifteen pounders has been commenced by the issue of forty-eight of these guns from reserves; and further issues will be made as these guns become available when the field artillery is re-armed.

Revision of Belfast Post Office.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he has received the reports of the two Dublin officials who recently revised the Belfast office; and, if so, whether their recommendations will be carried out.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The reports in question have been received and are under consideration.

Removal of Paupers.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been directed to a correspondence with the Local Government Board for Scotland in the case of a pauper named George Allsopp, a native of Hull, who was removed at the instance of the Halifax Guardians to Glasgow in September last, the man having been sent originally under legal warrant from Glasgow to Hull in 1894; and, if so, whether he will consider the desirability of affording the Scotch authorities similar particulars and an opportunity for appeal against the removal of any poor person from England to Scotland, such as pertains both in England and Ireland in the case of poor persons proposed to be removed from Scotland.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) I am aware of the correspondence referred to in the Question. I will take note of the suggestion that some alteration should be made in the Law relative to removals from England to Scotland. I presume, however, that the reference in the latter part of the Question is to the rights conferred by Section 5 of The Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898; if so, I may point out that there would be no power of appeal under this enactment in such a case as the present if it were proposed to remove a pauper from Scotland to England. The section does not apply where a pauper is born in the country from which it is proposed to remove him, and it is alleged that this was the case in the present instance.

Chargers for European Officers in Indian Cavalry Regiments.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether any decision has yet been arrived at by the Government of India in the matter of granting to the European Officers of the Indian Cavalry similar privileges as to chargers as those enjoyed by Cavalry Officers of the British Army, which was stated by the Secretary of State in June last year† to be then engaging the attention of the Government of India; and, if not, if he will state what is the reason for the delay.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The matter is still under consideration by the Government of India, who have been recently addressed asking for an early reply.

Payment of Commutation Allowances to Retired Members of Indian Uncovenanted Services.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the fact that retired members of the Indian Uncovenanted Services who draw their pensions in the United Kingdom, under the decision of the Select Committee of this House which sat in 1890, at the rate of 1*s*. 9*d*. for the rupee, are obliged to commute on a rupee basis the proportion of their pension which is sanctioned under the regulations, thus incidentally depriving them of a part of the benefit to which they are entitled under the settlement of 1890, the Government will allow commutation allowances in these cases to be remitted home at the officially fixed rate of 1*s*. 9*d*.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The matter has not been brought before me hitherto. I will give it careful consideration.

Army Estimates—Publication of Appendices.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether in the Army Estimates of the present year he will include all the appendices that are usually presented, some of which were from pressure of business omitted last year.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The reply is in the affirmative.

Expenditure under the South African Loan Act.

MR. BUCHANAN: To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state the amounts spent under the South African Loan Act for the various purposes enumerated in the Schedule to the Act.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) As I am not at present in possession of Returns of local expenditure on Guaranteed Loan Account up to date, I can only give approximate figures, which are as follows: I. A. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) £1,500,000 (actual). B. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) £2,482,700 (actual). C. (Paid to Cape and Natal, but there may have been further local expenditure) £1,500,000 (actual). II. (Including repayment of £1,000,000 to Imperial Exchequer for rolling stock) £12,000,000 (estimate). III. A. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) £3,000,000 (actual). B. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) †£2,000,000 (estimate). IV. A. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) £1,600,000 (estimate). B. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) †£1,800,000 (estimate). C. (Repaid to Imperial Treasury) £600,000 (estimate). Total £26,482,700.

Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

MR. BUCHANAN: To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will have placed in the Library the Transvaal Master and Servants Law, 1880, Law No. 3 of 1885, and the Peace Preservation Ordinance, 1903, or the sections of these Acts referred to in Clause 32 of the Draft Labour Ordinance.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) Copies will be placed in the Library.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Artillery Volunteers Armament.

MR. SEYMOUR ORMSBY-GORE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what steps are being taken towards the re-armament of the mobile batteries of the Artillery Volunteers.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER, Belfast, W.): Forty-four batteries have been armed with the 4·7 inch gun—total 176 guns. The re-armament of the remaining eighty-one batteries with fifteen pounders has been commenced by the issue of forty-eight of these guns from reserves; and further issues will be made as these guns become available when the field artillery is re-armed.

Indian Administrative Reforms.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of the Viceroy in his Budget speech of 25th

† These two amounts include a sum of £500,000, an advance repaid to the Imperial Treasury.

March, 1903, that he hoped to deal in the ensuing year with the question of the separation of judicial and executive functions; and whether he can state what decision has been arrived at upon the Memorial of 1st July, 1899, presented to the Secretary of State on the subject in August, 1899.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I understand that the subject is still under consideration by the Government of India.

Labour Statistics for the Transvaal Mines.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will give separately the numbers of white men and Kaffirs employed in and about gold and coal mines respectively in the Transvaal in January, or at the last available date for which the figures are available.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): In November, the latest month for which I have complete Returns, the numbers were as follows:—Whites in gold mines 12,703, whites in coal mines 469, coloured in gold mines 65,552, coloured in coal mines 7,626, or a total, including metallurgical works, diamond mines, etc., of 13,419 white and 74,299 coloured.

Chinese Labour for the Transvaal—Wages.

SIR JOHN LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the rate of wages to be paid to the Chinamen proposed to be imported into the Transvaal; how this rate will compare with those paid to miners in Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and Nevada; and whether he can lay upon the Table any official correspondence or reports from our self-governing colonies showing the grounds of their objection to the importation of Chinese labour.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I am not aware what rate of wages will be paid. The correspondence referred to will be found in the recently published Parliamentary Paper Command 1895.

Transvaal Imported Labour Ordinance.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, before sanction is given to the Transvaal Imported Labour Ordinance, he will secure that regulations shall be made assuring to all Chinese labourers who may be recruited for the Transvaal mines the right to be accompanied by their wives and children if they so desire, on terms similiar to those that would apply to the labourers themselves.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have already stated that it is my intention to take precautions that all reasonable facilities shall be given for the introduction of the families of labourers, and the regulations will be framed with the object of giving effect to that intention. I am unable, however, to give the pledge which the hon. Member desires, as the preparation of the regulations will occupy a considerable time.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state what is the purport of the laws which are specified in Section 35 of the draft of the Transvaal Labour Importation Ordinance, the provisions of which would not apply to Asiatic labourers imported into the Transvaal.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The first law is one to regulate the relative rights and duties of masters, servants, and apprentices. The second law is printed in translation with an amending law at page 57 of Cd. 7911 and is the law of the late Republic as to Coolies and Asiatics. Copies of the laws to which the hon. Member refers will be placed in the Library of the House.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there are any mines in the British Empire worked by indentured foreign labour under conditions similar to those proposed in the Transvaal Ordinance.

*MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies will it be legal, under Section 10 of draft Ordinance, for an importer of labour to convey, for a money consideration, his rights over imported labourers to another licensed person.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The hon. Member will see that Section 10 of the draft Ordinance is replaced by Section 11 in the amended Ordinance given in Cd. 1898 which provides adequate safeguards.

MR. BUCHANAN: If any further Amendments are introduced into the Ordinance on the Third Reading or before that stage, will they be laid on the Table before the debate takes place here?

*MR. LYTTELTON: Certainly.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Report, printed as Appendix I. to the Blue-book entitled Further Correspondence relating to the Affairs of the Transvaal, etc., presented to Parliament last week, which purports to be a reprint of the Report presented by the Chamber of Mines of the Witwatersrand to the ex-Colonial Secretary at Johannesburg in January, 1903, is not identical with that Report, seeing that the paragraph which expressed the objection of the Rand mining industry to white unskilled labour on account of the danger of labour unions being formed has been omitted; and, if so, will he state whether this omission is accidental or intentional; and whether he will furnish this House with a copy of the Report in the form in which it was originally presented to the then head of the Colonial Office.

*MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir. The Report as published is identical with that forwarded by the Chamber of Mines to the Colonial Office as being the Report presented to Mr. Chamberlain. I think it possible that the hon. Member has overlooked the last paragraph on page 341 of the Blue-book to which he refers.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the paragraph omitted from this Blue-book appeared in The Times summary of the Report on 9th February last year, and that the version of the Report which has been sent over by the Inspector of Mines is not apparently the same as that presented to the Ex-Colonial Secretary?

[No answer was returned.]

Macedonian Reforms.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs have His Majesty's Government given attention to the declarations of the Bulgarian Prime Minister in the Sobranye on Saturday last, and have they now any information of the intention of Servia and Bulgaria to unite with the Macedonian insurgents in hostilities against Turkey; will His Majesty's Government now propose to the Powers signatories of the Treaty of Berlin to hold a Conference for considering the position of the Balkan provinces of Turkey, and for concerting the means of establishing therein a settled form of government.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): His Majesty's Government have seen in the Press a report of General Petroff's speech in the Sobranye on Saturday last. We have no reason to suppose that either Servia or Bulgaria contemplate a deliberate violation of territorial arrangements guaranteed by international treaty. The speech referred to expresses the sincere desire of the Bulgarian Government to contribute to the carrying out of the Mursteg programme and, so far as Servia is concerned, we understand that a public announcement has recently been made of the intention of that country to follow the lead of Austria and Russia, and to support so far as lies in her power the introduction of reforms. The establishment of a settled form of Government, by the removal of administrative abuses, is the object, and will, it is hoped, be the result, of the measures now in course of adoption in Macedonia.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Has the right hon. Gentleman anything to say in regard to the last paragraph of the Question as to the calling together of a Conference?

*EARL PERCY was understood to reply in the negative.

Lord Curzon's Visit to Bushire.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs did Lord Curzon at his recent visit to Bushire, insist that the Prince Governor General of Shiraz should come off in a boat to the Viceroy's ship, and accompany him to the shore, instead of receiving him on the beach as proposed; was this demand authorised by His Majesty's Government; and is it to be regarded as a precedent in future.

*Earl PERCY: The answer to the first paragraph of the Question is in the negative. I have already informed the hon. Member that Lord Curzon's action was unfortunately rendered necessary by the inadequacy of the arrangements locally made to carry out the hospitable intentions of His Majesty the Shah. Under these circumstances no question of precedent arises.

Central African Labourers in Transvaal Mines.

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state how many of the 1,000 natives recruited last summer from the British Central Africa Protectorate for labour in the Transvaal mines have arrived at their destination, and the nature of their engagement and rate of pay.

*Earl PERCY: The number of natives who had arrived in the Transvaal at the beginning of this year was 818. The nature of their engagement and rate of pay will be found in Africa No. 2 (1903.)

Mr. WEIR: How many died.

*Earl PERCY: I cannot say exactly.

Government of the Soudan.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether arrangements have yet been made for candidates desirous of entering the service of the Government of the Soudan to undergo some educational test, especially as regards a knowledge of Arabic.

*Earl PERCY: Under the new system now in force the selection of candidates is determined by their educational qualifications, including, if possible, the possession of a University degree. At the expiry of a year from the date of selection they are required to pass an examination in Arabic.

Canton-Kowloon Railway.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, seeing that the British and Chinese Corporation were granted a preliminary agreement for the construction of the Canton-Kowloon Railway on the 28th March, 1898, will he state when the final agreement is expected to be concluded and the construction of the line proceeded with.

Earl PERCY: The preliminary Agreement for the construction of the Canton-Kowloon line was signed on the 28th March, 1898. We are informed by the British and Chinese Corporation that as soon as arrangements have been made for financing the Shanghai-Nanking Railway, negotiations for the conclusion of the final agreement for the construction of the Canton-Kowloon line will be proceeded with. The matter is receiving very careful attention.

Electricity in Mines.

Mr. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any steps are being taken to prepare special rules for the purpose of regulating the use of electricity in mines, in accordance with the recommendations of the Departmental Committee.

*The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Akers Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): The Report of the Committee on the use of electricity in mines is now before me, and I am considering the best steps to take with the view of establishing special rules in accordance with its recommendations.

Mr. TENNANT (Berwickshire): Will the Report be laid on the Table of the House?

*Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS: There can be no objection to that as far as I know. I think it has been done; if not, I will consider the point.

Christ's Hospital Site.

Mr. COHEN (Islington, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for the City of London (Sir Joseph Dimsdale) I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether, in arranging for the erection of buildings on the site of Christ's Hospital, he will, by means of lay-byes or otherwise, provide facilities for the increasing traffic of the Post Office service, so that the vehicles of the Department can be accommodated without adding to the congestion of the traffic in the neighbourhood surrounding the site.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord Stanley, Lancashire, Westhoughton): Yes, Sir. In planning the buildings to be erected the object indicated by the hon. Member shall be kept in view.

Irish Railway Freights.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the cost of carriage of a ton of eggs to London from Denmark is 24s., from Russia 22s., and from Galway 94s.; and, if so, whether, in view of the dissatisfaction regarding the charges of Irish Railways, he will recommend the appointment of a Departmental or Viceregal Commission to inquire into and report upon the subject.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Wyndham, Dover): The Department of Agriculture is inquiring into the accuracy of the fact alleged in the first part of the Question. The third annual Report of the Department which was recently presented to Parliament and will be in the hands of hon. Members in a few days, contains an interesting account of the steps taken by the Department with a view to the reduction of railway rates in cases where its intervention was sought. These steps were followed by successful results in a number of instances. The Department is at present engaged in collecting information in respect to charges for the carriage of Irish and Continental agricultural produce, and the question of the necessity for further inquiry, as suggested, can best be decided when these investigations have been completed.

Russia Japanese War—Duties of Neutrals.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury have His Majesty's Government issued instructions to the authorities of British ports and coaling stations abroad, prescribing to them their conduct, in the event of war, towards belligerent ships of war; will such ships of war only be permitted in such ports to be supplied with so much coal as will suffice to take them to the nearest port of their own country, and no more; will they be prohibited from receiving any further supply of coal in any other British port until the expiration of three months from the date of the first supply; will their stay in such ports be restricted to twenty-four hours, except in the case of stress of weather or distress for necessary repairs; will such vessels be prohibited from bringing prizes into British ports; and will the same rules be enforced in the ports of the British self-governing Colonies. I will further ask whether, seeing that war has broken out, the Government will advise His Majesty to issue a proclamation of neutrality.

*Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS: As regards the Question on the Paper I have to say that instructions will be issued to the authorities at British ports, including those in self-governing colonies. They will be similar to the instructions issued on previous occasions. My hon. friend has correctly stated their effect. In regard to the further Question, a Council will be held to-morrow, at which the proclamation of neutrality will be approved, and a special Gazette will appear to-morrow with it.

OUT-DOOR RELIEF (FRIENDLY SOCIETIES) BILL.

Order for Second Reading upon Friday, 25th March read, and discharged. Bill withdrawn.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

[Seventh Day.]

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

"At the end of the Question, to add the words, 'But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) said that one hole had been picked in the Resolution of his right hon. friend the Member for the Montrose Burghs by speakers on behalf of the Government. On his own side of the House hon. Members thoroughly understood the meaning of the opening words of the Amendment: "But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers." Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, complained that no explanation had been given of them and ridiculed their introduction. He attached the utmost importance to them. As to the fact about the declarations being conflicting there could be no doubt that no attempt had been made by hon. Members opposite to prove otherwise. The principal spokesman on behalf of the Government had laughed at the idea that these conflicting opinions had the smallest bearing upon our deliberations on the finances of the year. But what was the case? Those who sat on his side of the House were, and had always been, most strongly opposed to indirect taxation. Three years ago the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol made a statement on the subject of the relation of direct with indirect taxation. He then asserted that he might be able by a wise distribution of taxes to reach what he called a fair balance between them, and he hoped it would be maintained in the future. But last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer took off a far larger proportion of direct than of indirect war taxation, and he had in the recess pointed out to the country that we ought next to reduce the indirect taxation, which pressed most heavily on the poorer—the working classes of the community—that we ought to get rid of the war taxes on tea and sugar. What was the meaning then of the introduction of the words which speakers for the Government had ridiculed? It was simply that they saw from the declarations of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer that he, and the majority of the Cabinet who agreed with him, and who agreed with the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would not attempt the reduction of these taxes this year because they wished to keep them in hand as a future gift with which to sweeten the unpopular taxation on bread and meat to which they were favourable. The speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which he had referred went to show that there would be no surplus in this year's Budget. He had told them there would be no reduction of military expenditure to which the Government pledged themselves last year, and that it was only to be looked forward to a year hence. What was the object of that? It surely was to prepare the country for the fact that there would be no reduction of indirect taxation. If, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman had omitted to offer the House any explanation of these opening words, it was because those who sat on the Opposition side found perfectly clear, without explanation, words which apparently hon. Members opposite declared to be incomprehensible. He had alluded to the declarations of the Government as conflicting, and had assumed that there could be no doubt on that point. It had been said, however, that there had been a repudiation, or a recantation made in the course of the debate. He confessed that the recantation was so thin that he could not see it, nor could he believe or trust in it as a policy. The President of the Board of Trade had expressed his opinions pretty freely, but were those opinions entertained by the overwhelming majority of the Cabinet? He was, clearly, still an adherent of the main point of the Birmingham programme, for he said in answer to an interruption that he would be glad to see a moderate tax on food.

The Prime Minister had gone back on that programme on one point, from which, as he understood, other members of the Cabinet had not receded. Last year he expressed his complete concurrence with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, not only as to the necessity of preference and a tax on bread and meat, but he also agreed that the reform was urgent and of Imperial necessity, and that the means suggested by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham were the only means of securing the end in view. The word "only" was important. At Manchester, however, the Prime Minister stated that he had "changed his opinion." Then he said that while he still held to all he had said upon fiscal union, he was not sure now that it was the only direction in which closer union might be sought, and he then went on to discuss the proposals put forward by the right hon. Member for Huntingdonshire. That was a complete giving away of the situation of urgency for the taxes on bread and meat. What he was anxious to know was, whether the Government followed the Prime Minister in this very essential alteration of the programme. It was an alteration which made the whole difference between mere speculative or academic consideration of the subject such as had gone on for the last thirty or forty years, and the treatment of it as a Parliamentary and electoral question. If the Government adhered to the declaration of the Prime Minister, then the right hon. Gentleman would have succeeded—to use an American phrase—in "side-tracking" the right hon. Member for West Birmingham by shunting his express train into a siding while the Government's slow luggage train rumbled past. The declaration welcomed by the free-fooders in that debate was contained in the words that even if the Government obtained a mandate at the next general election they would not be entitled by it to carry out a policy of preference. But the President of the Board of Trade, after making that declaration, went on to deal with the question of urgency, and in response to an interruption he said that urgency was created when the Colonies offered us a preference at the Conference two years ago. But if this was still an Imperial policy as well as urgent, he should like to know to which portion of the Empire urgency applied. India had established, without difference of opinion, that it was totally inapplicable there. The Blue-book just issued was full of most admirable information by which the Government of India, apparently with the concurrence of the Government at home, conclusively established the utter inapplicability of the whole principle to India. It was also inapplicable to our tropical colonies. Australia had never asked for it and had never offered it, and the first thing the Australian Government did last year was to pledge itself not to make any such proposal. That pledge had been renewed since the general elections. There remained only New Zealand and Canada, for South Africa at present was out of the question, as she was importing food and likely to continue doing so for a considerable period. If the urgency was then so great as it affected those colonies, how could the Government resist the demand for a dissolution to obtain the opinion of the country?

In the course of the debate there had been some interesting exchanges of words across the gangway opposite, and he listened with great interest to these intellectual diversions. In one of them the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich, who combined, in a degree never before probably attained in Parliament, eloquence of speech with the power of making most disagreeable interruptions, remarked that they had Conservative Members opposed by Cabinet Ministers. The President of the Board of Trade, who was always much more frank in answer to interruptions than when speaking in measured language, replied that the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was much more easy to attack than the Government policy. That was a complete explanation of the remarkable shifts of attitude on the Ministerial side which had been witnessed. The hon. Member for Oldham, who had contributed so much valuable material to the discussion on this question, interrupted the President of the Board of Trade by saying that the policy of the Prime Minister was not very important because it was not the issue before the country. To that the right hon. Gentleman replied that it was the policy before the country, although there was an organised conspiracy to represent the issue as one between free trade and protection. That he absolutely denied. It was useless to say that the policy of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham was not the issue before the country in the face of the assertions of the right hon. Member himself. The peroration of every one of the speeches delivered by the right hon. Gentleman in his campaign, since the 20th May last, put that forward as the urgent issue on which the opinion of the country would have to be taken at the next general election. How could the Government pretend it was not the issue when the programme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was supported by the private opinion of almost every member of the Cabinet? In his speech the President of the Board of Trade placed the members of the Government in four categories. First there were the free importers. They were not very numerous, indeed, probably the Postmaster-General would stand in that class alone. Then there were those in favour of the Government policy of retaliation; thirdly, there were those who followed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in favour of preference, including probably every member of the Government except the Postmaster-General; and lastly, there were the protectionists. Of course there were no avowed protectionists in the Government. The President of the Board of Trade defined protection and distinguished it from defence. What he himself would call protectionists must, he suppose, be described as those who advocated defensive measures—the President of the Local Government Board, the President of the Board of Agriculture, and the Secretary to the Board of Trade. It was a new doctrine, striking at the root of Ministerial responsibility, that the Parliamentary Secretary of a Board should, in matters which were the direct concern of the Board, maintain a policy different from that of the head of his Department. Such a thing had never been known before, but it was not the least painful or ridiculous feature of the Government's present position. Usually a Secretary followed the directions of his President or resigned. There was an old Provencal saying, written on the base of a statue of Jason in a great fortress in the Mediterranean, which, translated, read—

> "How happy are you, Jason, to possess two jaws.
> With one you can eat, with the other drink, without pause."

The words might be adapted to the Board of Trade at the present moment, whose representatives in the House spoke with such different voices. Both of them supported officially, no doubt, the Government programme of retaliation, and both very probably privately supported the programme of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham for taxing meat and bread; but one came to the House and made a speech full of highly protectionist arguments which the other most expressly repudiated. That was absolutely unprecedented.

The President of the Board of Trade in his speech developed a very interesting definition of protection. He said that there was great ambiguity in the word, and he drew a distinction between defensive duties and protection. There was not a protectionist manufacturer on the Continent who, when asked to consent to the lowering of duties on goods he was interested in, did not use the argument that because they had conscription in their country they ought to be protected against us. The Secretary to the Board of Trade sympathised with protection, while the President of the Board of Trade declared that it was not protection—it was only defence against an unfair advantage—accorded to the foreigner. With regard to the proposal of a 10 per cent. duty, the Government spoke of it as if it were a uniform duty of 10 per cent. imposed for revenue. It was nothing of the kind. The President of the Board of Trade could not have read the speeches of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham or the terms of the invitation to the Tariff Commission. The duty was to be one averaging 10 per cent., so that it might vary from nothing to 60 per cent. It was not, as the President of the Board of Trade represented, a duty for revenue purposes only; and it was the extremes and not the average that must be considered. If he had the fortune to be a member of the Commission now sitting on the subject, he would put 60 per cent. on everthing he wanted to keep out, and nothing on everything he wanted to use in the course of his employment or trade. Then the average of 10 per cent. would disappear into space. The Secretary of the Board of Trade had no concern with the revenue argument; he was thinking of our distressed industries. The President of the Board of Trade was a sort of 20th century Cobden, pursuing what he thought would be Cobden's methods were he living to-day, and meeting, he said, in the course of his struggles with a resuscitated demon who was likely to thwart his efforts. He might, in passing, observe that the two sides of the House differed as to who the demon was. The Secretary to that Board of Trade was one of the few people who believed in the value of the Canadian preference.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Everyone does.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said the Board of Trade did not believe in it at the time of the conference.

THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. BONAR LAW, Glasgow, Blackfriars): Can the right hon. Baronet read any passage declaring against it?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE replied that both the Board of Trade and the then Colonial Secretary explained at the conference that it had been a grievous disappointment. But that was not his point to which he was coming.

MR. BONAR LAW: I said that while our rise was £4,000,000 the German rise was £1,000,000.

SIR CHARLES DILKE said he then asked what were the percentages, but the question was not answered. The hon. Member further said that until we got preference our trade with Canada was going down; after preference our trade continued to increase. But in the year ending 30th June, 1897, before preference, the percentage of the total imports into Canada which came from the United Kingdom was 27·58, whereas in 1902 it was only 24·95.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Is the right hon. Baronet aware that the British and Irish exports to Canada rose from £5,000,000 in 1897 to £10,000,000 in 1902?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said that that had nothing to do with his point. The Canadian preference, which was the only one worth considering, so evidently broke down that it was the very ground on which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham edged off preference, and in his speech at Glasgow and Greenock developed a new argument of a quid pro quo for the manufacturers of this country. His point was that the Colonies would not start new industries in competition with those of the mother country—a very old and very dangerous quid pro quo, but one which would undoubtedly have been valuable. It was that more than anything else that led to the secession of the United States. But that suggestion had now gone. Everyone who knew the Colonies knew that it would go the day after they heard of it. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich in his very careful examination of the Australian and other figures, an examination which established beyond the possibility of a doubt that this question did not touch India or the Crown Colonies, but Canada alone. That examination went to show how small was the margin of trade into which we could hope to cut under an artificial system of the kind proposed. The opponents of the new policy were not fighting against hypothetical retaliation in some future Parliament, at some distant date, but against a practical policy of protection put before the country with as much power as any policy had ever been put, with the complete applause, except in Lancashire, of the governing bodies of most of the Conservative constituencies. They were fighting against that policy which overshadowed the policy of the Government, and in fighting against it they were fighting against the opinions entertained by almost every individual member of the Cabinet. The Colonial Secretary in a recent speeh took a hint from the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for West Birmingham as to a new necessity for protection. He might call it a defensive rather than a protectionist policy, but it was indistinguishable from protection. Then there was the fact that a leading member of the Government had gone to a constituency to oppose and attack a Conservative Member who supported the policy of the Government as officially announced. The President of the Local Government Board contradicted the statement of the mover of the Amendment with reference to the matter, but what occurred was that the right hon. Gentleman acted as godfather or sponsor to a candidate whom he was bringing out to oppose the hon. Member for the Chippenham Division of Wiltshire on the ground that the latter had opposed the policy of the Government on education, the Army, and the fiscal question. As to education, the hon. Baronet had voted for one Amendment—a sign of independence to be commended rather than condemned.

Sir J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham) intimated that he simply delivered a speech.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE said that that was an even smaller offence. As to the Army, everybody opposed the Government policy; the Government themselves opposed it. They had now reversed it. Therefore, the fiscal question alone remained, and it was on that question that the hon. Baronet was opposed in his constituency, and a rival candidate brought out by a prominent member of the Cabinet. In the speech complained of the President of the Local Government Board said—

> "Sir Audley Neeld, as at present advised, was not in favour of taxing bread and meat . . . but it was not certain that at a later date he would not be in favour of the fuller and wider policy."

That was simply another case of the adoption of the "at present" of the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. But that "fuller and wider policy" was not the policy of the Government as avowed in this House. Moreover, the scheme constituted an unworthy appeal on different grounds to different classes of electors, for, while hopes of assistance were held out to decaying industries, the labourers were told that the candidate was against taxing bread and meat.

Then there was the new departure of the Colonial Secretary, who developed at great length his policy of protection or defence on account of the labour conditions being more favourable and more costly in this country than abroad. The right hon. Gentleman cited a number of Acts of Parliament from which he appeared to think foreign manufacturers were free. He referred to legislation affecting child labour in factories, the Coal Mines Regulations Acts, the Railway Regulation Acts, the Workmen's Compensation Act, and the Combination Act giving liberty to trades unions. What were the facts? With regard to many aspects of child labour foreign nations were in advance of this country, and there was about to be held an international conference on the subject at which he hoped His Majesty's Government would be represented, although they had not yet announced that they would be. As to the Railway Regulation Acts, the American Acts were enormously in advance of ours. Then, too, the Combination Laws in many countries were in advance of ours as now declared by the courts. But the main items were the factories and workshops legislation, workmen's compensation, and the law of truck. As a matter of fact, truck did not affect the question, but the laws affecting it were better abroad than here, and the Colonial Secretary had just sanctioned in South Africa the most appalling system of truck the world had ever seen. The House of Commons was not the place for a detailed examination of the small points in such legislation, but with regard to the compensation principle it was overwhelmingly and triumphantly proved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham himself that the charge was so infinitesimal that it was utterly ridiculous for capitalists to urge that it could produce any ground whatever for protection. At that time Germany alone had only the compensation law, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was taking what he described as short and halting steps in the direction of such legislation. Since then not only had the German legislation been maintained, but France had passed a law greatly in advance of ours, and under which the benefits were double the benefits under the English law, as was proved by the insurance statistics. Then Belgium, hitherto the most backward nation in labour legislation, had passed a law in advance even of the French. As to factory legislation, in many points foreign countries were in advance of this country, notably in respect of dangerous trades. Generally speaking, foreign countries had drawn closer to us in those points in which previously they were behind, and in many points they were now considerably ahead. The Radicals thought the prosperity argument had been pushed too far, for it was one which struck at the very root of Radicalism, of which the foundation lay in the sufferings of the people. They knew of those sufferings which stood in need of drastic remedies. They were convinced that the remedies now proposed were foolish remedies which would increase and intensify those sufferings.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Oh, no.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The first to turn the prosperity argument against them would be the hon. and gallant Member for Sheffield. They could not urge too strongly that the prosperity argument was a dangerous one which would be turned against them. All free-traders believed that the suggested remedies would be ten times worse in a period of depression, and they asked the Government to take the opinion of the country before doing anything in this direction. The Government ought to come out into the open and declare their policy. They ought to take the opinion of the country, and when a dissolution came those who opposed any alteration would appeal with confidence to the common sense of the democracy.

*MR. RITCHIE (Croydon): When my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade rose to reply to the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment he characterised the Amendment as an expedient, and he applied to it an adjective which he afterwards withdrew. No doubt it was an expedient, and I am bound to say I thought at the time that it was a bad expedient from the right hon. Gentleman's point of view; that is to say, if his desire was, as my right hon. friend seemed to suppose it was, to obtain votes from this side of the House, because it is clear that there are Members on this side of the House who may be in agreement with the right hon. Gentleman's views, and yet are not disposed to support an Amendment of this kind, because it is, and always will be, considered as a Motion of want of confidence in the Government. Therefore, from the right hon. Gentleman's point of view I think it was a bad expedient; but at the same time I quite sympathise with him in his desire to obtain a speedy discussion on one of the most momentous and important subjects it is possible to bring before the House of Commons. I am one of those who regret, and regret very greatly, that the House of Commons was not afforded an adequate opportunity last session of discussing the question. I may say with regard to my feelings on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman that I agree with every word of it. There is nothing in it from which I dissent. I agree with all the propositions he puts in it. I imagine that the preamble to the Resolution is an insignificant part of the Resolution, and in all probablity did not at one time form a portion of the Resolution. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman put it in as a preamble. Well, Sir, I had to consider what should be my attitude towards an Amendment of this kind with which I entirely agree. I had to consider whether or not I should take the step of voting for it even if it did imply a vote of want of confidence; and I came to the conclusion that, before coming to a definite resolution, it would be necessary, and indeed, only proper, that I should hear from the Government Bench a declaration of their policy with regard to this matter; and I say at once that I listened with great satisfaction to the bulk of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. It seemed to me that it was the speech of a free-trader, and I believe, for myself, that the right hon. Gentleman is a free-trader. He has no doubt got some unhappy surroundings, but I believe that he is at heart a free-trader. I was not surprised, therefore, to hear from him what was undoubtedly a free-trade speech. But his speech caused some consternation on some of the Benches near where I am sitting; and because of the consternation that it caused, and because of the speech itself, I felt after it was delivered that it might be possible for me to support the right hon. Gentleman. I have said that the speech caused consternation, and because of that consternation I imagine it was thought politic that some other member of the Government who was free from the charge of being a free trader, and against whom no such charge could be made, should rise and endeavour to do away with the consternation which was caused by the speech of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade. And I confess that, after having listened to that other speech, I felt myself to be quite at sea as to what the policy of the Government really was. Not that it is remarkable that in dealing with this question the Government should have two voices. On the contrary, during all the time that this question has been discussed in the country, they have spoken, not only with two, but with several voices. But I confess I was somewhat astonished that the Secretary to the Board of Trade should get up and make a speech which was, as I am sure everybody who heard it must consider it, a protectionist speech from a convinced protectionist. Before I make up my mind conclusively on the subject of the action which I shall take, I must hear some further declarations from the Government, and I trust that they may be such as will not compel me at last to go into the lobby against them, as I should be very unwilling to do. My hon. friend, as I have said, made a protectionist speech. It was an elaborate attack on free trade. It was a strong plea for protection. The hon. Gentleman considered that Cobden's expectations had been falsified. Cobden would have been the greatest of all prophets I have ever heard of if all his expectations had been fulfilled. But does my hon. friend think that if Cobden could possibly return to this sphere he would be a dissatisfied man? Would he not look around and see a mercantile fleet that covers the sea, a commerce that is the envy of the world, wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, pauperism decreased by 50 per cent., the wages of the working classes and their social condition enormously improved, and the comfort and well-being of the people luxurious compared to what it was in Cobden's time? I venture to say that Cobden in his wildest dreams never contemplated a higher state of prosperity than that which is enjoyed by this country and all its inhabitants.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: What about the unemployed?

*Mr. RITCHIE: The unemployed? I should like the hon. Gentleman to make himself acquainted with the state of employment at the time of Cobden. I should like him to compare the condition of the dwellings of the working classes in the time of Cobden with what it is now. I should like him to compare the wages of any labouring class in Cobden's time with the wages of the same class now. I would ask him to look back at the purchasing power of money in Cobden's time and compare it with the purchasing power of money now, and to judge for himself whether a case has not been made out that Cobden in his wildest dreams never contemplated. It has become the fashion in some quarters to consider Cobdenism and the followers of Cobden as a reproach, as something to be sneered at. I avow, at any rate, regardless of those sneers, that I have no objection to be called one of those who admire and reverence the great work which Mr. Cobden did. My hon. friend told us that Cobden laid a demon, and that the demon had risen again. I think the demon has risen again in the guise of a protecting angel. [AN HON. MEMBER: He comes from Sheffield.] My hon. friend said that the demon, in the shape of foreign countries, said to us, "You may buy from us, but you shall not sell to us." How can we buy if we do not sell? My hon. friend may have, and no doubt he has, a considerable knowledge of a certain branch of industry, but he has very little knowledge of economics if he fancies that we can possibly be buyers and not sellers. Sir, he gave some figures which, according to him, proved that we do not sell although we buy; but in arriving at these figures he omitted all reference to our services. He took no account of the remittance of interest or the movement of capital. Anyone who attempts to draw comparisons without taking these things into account does not understand the elements of the movement of merchandise. Look at America. My hon. friend asked how is it that their exports exceed the imports. That was received with ringing cheers by many Gentlemen on this side of the House. Has he never heard of the enormous indebtedness of America to all Europe? Does he not know that from 1897 to 1899 America was an enormous purchaser of securities in Europe? Last year they again largely increased their purchases, and have been borrowing largely in our market. How has the interest on all that money been paid? By the export of goods. Not only that but the borrowing by the United States in this country and other parts of Europe has been at a much higher rate of interest than before. Money which they were able to get at 3 per cent., or a little over, they have to pay 5 per cent. for now. All that increase of interest having to be remitted has increased their exports.

The hon. Gentleman made another statement to the effect that exports last year rose, but employment fell. It is quite true the home market is not so good as it was. Can anybody be surprised? Does anyone imagine that we can spend two or three hundred millions of money on unproductive work, without this telling upon the purchasing power of the people? Of course, we have had very dear money. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, when he spoke at the Guildhall, asked how it happened that money was almost for the first time dearer in London than on the Continent? Someone at once replied, "The war." I am not saying anything against the war. I am only stating the fact that we cannot expect our home market, until the strain that has been brought to bear on the people of this country is somewhat mitigated, to be as good as it was. High taxation and dear money must tell on the home market. But in addition to that municipal work is postponed. Municipalities who have work to do, do not want to go into the market and borrow at the heavy rate they would have to pay now, and they defer carrying on work to some time when they hope they may be able to borrow more cheaply in the money market. That leads to want of employment. And so it is with regard to companies and individuals. Everybody who knows commercial matters knows that companies are not forming as they were, and that enterprise has been checked for the moment. All these things tend, of course, somewhat to make the home market bad. But what do the figures for 1903 show? That though the home trade is bad, foreign trade has been good. Why have foreign exports risen? Because, in consequence of bad harvests, we had to import more wheat. And I recommend this to the hon. Gentleman, who does not seem to think that imports and exports have any very great correlation. Notwithstanding the bad trade here, and in consequence in my opinion of the larger imports of food we required, more exports had necessarily to be sent out. My. hon. friend led us to imagine, though he did not exactly say so in so many words, that he thought large imports meant large unemployment of our people. Now I assert quite the contrary, and I refer him to his own Blue-book, which I am sorry has not been subjected to examination by independent experts on the part of the Government, either in the shape of a Royal Commission or otherwise, so that the figures might have been digested and put into some form easily "understanded of the people." But many things are easily found there, and what is found with regard to employment? In 1889 imports beat the record, The import of manufactured goods rose to £100,000,000. According to the Secretary of the Board of Trade this must have produced a record of unemployment. It did produce a record, but it was a record for the goodness of employment. The number of unemployed fell to 2.1 per cent. I assert that this is the lowest possible figure to which unemployment could go. When hon. Gentlemen think of the number of men who are sick, or who, either from one cause or another, are temporarily prevented from working, I think they will consider that 2 per cent. of unemployment is the least we could possibly expect. Well, Sir, imports fell off, and unemployment rose. In 1893 imports of manufactured articles fell to £98,000,000, and unemployment rose to 7½ per cent. From 1893 to 1900 imports of manufactures rose steadily and the number of unemployed declined in almost exact proportion.

MR. BONAR LAW: I am sorry to interrupt my hon. friend, but he has entirely misunderstood the argument I was trying to put before the House. I began by saying it was unfair to use a single year as an indication of the state of our trade. I said that if you do insist on taking that single year, you will find that exports have a greater bearing than imports—I expressly said nothing more —upon the prosperity of trade. Nothing further than that.

*MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member at that time was speaking about employment. I am not taking one single year, I am taking several years, and I assert that in the years between 1893 and 1900 the imports of manufactured articles rose steadily and the number of unemployed declined steadily in almost exact proportion. In 1896 the imports were £117,500,000 and the unemployed 3½ per cent. In 1899 the imports were £136,000,000 and the unemployed 2½ per cent.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: May I ask my right hon. friend if the statistics of unemployment to which he refers do not relate only to the most skilled artisans of the country reporting through the trade unions to the Board of Trade, and not to the state of employment as a whole? Will he also give the figures for 1903?

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not happen to have these figures. The question he puts to me as to the returns, I can only answer by saying that the only means by which we can get an idea of the unemployed is from the returns of the trade-unions, but the hon. Gentleman surely knows that if the trade unionists who are skilled artisans are employed, this must necessarily imply that a corresponding number of those who work with them in the trades with which they are connected must be employed. May I say also that large imports have been marked by an extraordinary decline in emigration? I would advise the House not to believe that an abundance of necessaries is bad. But will unemployment be decreased by protection? That is the great point. How about protected countries? Their state of unemployment is probably much worse than ours. What would protection do? It would decrease our purchasing power and so damage the home market. It would cripple us in our competition in foreign markets, and make everything dearer, and I should like to know whether that is at all likely to help us in our competition with the other nations of the world. Some say "Look at Germany; that protective country has increased exports to a greater extent than we have done." It is true that Germany is making great strides. There is a great deal of enterprise and skill in Germany; but there are other causes at work. Does the House imagine that the export trade of Germany is altogether a profitable trade? I very much doubt whether it is, and, after all, the question of profit or not in the export trade is very material. There is no doubt that the Government in Germany does lend a hand to trade—to the expansion of trade, which we in our system do not. Government railways, whether in Germany or abroad, in China or elsewhere, are made of German material, and by Germans. Whether that is advantageous to German trade in the Colonies and elsewhere is probably a different matter. But take German private enterprise. Look at the education of students. How is it that they have such an enormous expansion of their electrical industries in South America and elsewhere? It is very largely because every great manufacturer in Germany strives to provide himself with young men who have been scientifically educated, and who do much to keep manufactures on proper scientific lines. Now I have been told that at Owens College, where education of a similar character is given, there is absolutely no home demand for the students who go up to that college. And I am told that the great demand for the young men who come from Owens College is not from this country, but from the United States. My hon. friend in talking about exports asked us, I think, to exclude raw materials, and I suppose he meant coal. Now, why should we exclude coal? Is he afraid of the supply running short? I do not know whether the Royal Commission that has been sitting on the subject of our coal supply has yet reported; but I have good reason to believe that they will report that the supply of coal in this country is practically inexhaustible for a vast number of years. Suppose we were to put any impediment on the export of coal, are we going to do the same thing with everything that comes out of the earth, because, if we do, it will diminish the occupation of a vast number of people and strike a blow at our carrying trade.

I shall reserve further remarks on all these questions until I know from some other member of the Government what the views of the Government really are. But in the meantime I prefer to take the speech of the President to that of the Secretary to the Board of Trade. If we take the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, taxes on food, preferential tariffs, protective duties, and bounties—all are gone, and only retaliation remains. I agree with my noble friend who spoke last night that if that is all that is left of the Government policy it is a great pity that there should have been so much hubbub. Retaliation, however advisable it may be in some cases, is not a policy; it is only an expedient. It is not a policy to be emblazoned upon the banners of the Government, and in favour of which all the members of the Government are to go preaching a crusade. Of course we all acknowledge that there is nothing economically unsound about retaliation provided that Parliament is asked to decide in every case. That is absolutely essential; and I am sorry it is one of the subjects on which I have been able to obtain no information. It was my special duty, in discussing this question of retaliation with my colleagues, to inquire very closely into it, as, occupying the position I did, I should, perhaps, be more responsible than any other member of the Government. Therefore, while I had no hesitation about assenting to this expedient where it was shown that it could do us no harm, and that it would be effective, I felt bound to point out to my colleagues the difficulties in its application. And some of these difficulties I would like to refer to. But before I pass on to their consideration I must notice the remarks of my hon. friend on the tinplate industry. Well, no doubt that was a bad case. The tinplate industry suffered a good deal from the tax imposed in the United States under the Dingley tariff. But I am glad to say that the export trade in tinplates has very nearly recovered to what it was. But what was the effect of the high tariff on tinplates in the United States itself? It did enormous damage to the packing industry, which was diverted to other countries, while it greatly assisted trade in this country. I have no doubt that, although the export did fall off considerably, the consumption of tinplates in this country very greatly increased in consequence of their additional cost in the United States to all packing industries. I would have liked to ask my hon. friend when he was giving the illustration of that industry as to the power which the Government asked for—the power, viz., of retaliation—does he believe for a moment that any power of retaliation which we could possibly exercise would have had the smallest effect on the United States to prevent them passing the Dingley Tariff Bill? Of course he does not believe that, and I would remind him that the President of the Board of Trade stated the day before, that the United States was one of the countries to which we could not apply retaliation.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): I said it would be more difficult to bring it to bear on the United States than on some other countries.

*MR. RITCHIE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, but that admission is sufficient for the House, and for my argument. One of the difficulties about retaliation is that we are far more vulnerable than any other country, because the bulk of our imports are not luxuries but the prime necessaries of life. And then our shipping is particularly open to attack. We are, of course, the great carrying power of the world, and if differential duties were put on our shipping it would be a vital blow to that industry. In considering the application of retaliation we should not leave that out of sight. My hon. friend said that the tariff wars which had occurred had been productive of good. My noble friend has given his answer on that question and has shown that the tariff war between France and Italy had caused a loss of £120,000,000, and, as was naturally to be expected, the markets being open to other countries, the trade between France and Italy had been greatly diverted into other channels. And once trade is so diverted, it is very difficult to get it back again. There is only one paragraph in the Report which I should like to read to the House, apart altogether from the question of pecuniary loss. The Report says—

"It disturbs the ancient and cordial industrial and commercial relations which have hitherto existed between the two countries."

I hope that in considering this question we will not leave out of account the disturbance of our industrial, commercial, and other relations, which would in all probability take place if we were unhappily to revert to the policy of retaliation. My right hon. friend states he did not say that it would be impossible to apply retaliation to Russia and the United States, but that it would be most difficult. Russia, however, is the greatest offender. The duty in Russia is 131 per cent. ad valorem—which, I should say, is barbarous and unfair. In the United States the duty is 73 per cent., and in Germany only 25 per cent. Are we to retaliate against Germany with a 25 per cent. duty, and not to be able to retaliate against Russia with a 131 per cent. duty? The McKinley tariff and the Dingley tariff inflicted great loss on our trade and industry beyond comparison, more severe than has ever been caused by any other protectionist measures. Are we to leave Russia with her tariff of 131 per cent. and the United States of America with their tariff of 73 per cent. alone, and retaliate against Germany with its 25 per cent.? Be it remembered that we do a vast and a most profitable trade with Germany. The system of free imports, as I think, and as my hon. friend the Member for Oldham has shown, has its own very effective machinery of retaliation, working under an inexorable law. Germany dumps ship-plates. Here we retaliate by selling the German ships, built of his own steel, at a price with which he cannot compete. The German dumps his steel and we retaliate by underselling his machinery. Take a single instance from the United States Consular Reports as an illustration.

"An English firm has just competed successfully as against German tenderers for the plant of the Municipal Gas Works at Copenhagen, and the cause of their success was this"—

I ask the House to note it—

"They have the command of the raw material dumped by Germans at a price lower than the German manufacturer could obtain it, and were consequently able to undersell him for the finished plant."

This is effective retaliation. My hon. friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade showed that the action of this country in connection with Germany's threat to Canada proves the efficiency of retalition. Well, I had something to do with the compilation of the despatch to Germany on that subject, and I am very glad to think that it had that effect. The hon. Gentleman said—

"It is an object lesson which, if properly understood, would establish the efficiency of retaliation."

But if that be so, it destroys the case for a mandate. If this can be done, as it can be done under existing circumstances, why put the country into a state of excitement by asking for a mandate?

Now, with regard to dumping, dumping may be very innocent, even welcome in some cases, but in other cases, when a great industry is really threatened, it should be resisted. But here the process is by no means easy. Where it is the result of bounties, as in sugar, it can, no doubt, be met, if expedient; but it may be individual dumping, and where it is individual dumping it is difficult to see how it can be effectually met. It would be difficult to impose a duty on one set of goods dumped and not on another set. We have not quite a free hand on this question of dumping. If we shut out dumped goods where do they go? They are not thrown into the sea. They must go elsewhere, and with what result? Take a case. The American dumper offers us for £90 what it would cost us £100 to produce. We refuse it, and it goes elsewhere. [An HON. MEMBER on the GOVERNMENT Benches: Where?] It can obtain entrance into protected countries notwithstanding their protection, but has the hon. Member never heard of neutral markets? Going elsewhere means competing with our export trade. Yes, and competing successfully. Because he is offering for £90 the same goods it costs us £100 to produce. In other words, for every £90 of dumped goods which we shut out we must lose £100 of our export trade. This is not all. The dumped goods are, in the main, only half manufactured, and the cheaper our manufacturers can buy them the cheaper they can turn out the finished produce, and the better chance of exporting it at a profit. If we shut out dumped goods we must be prepared to encounter competition from countries which are ready to take the cheapest raw material which dumping provides. There is another case which I saw in a Consular Report from Hamburg. Germans cannot buy their ships in Germany. They are buying their ships in England, made from their own iron, which they are unable to buy from German makers because of the price. The whole principle of dumping is to sell very dear at home and to sell very cheap abroad. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade has some experience of dumping, and has no doubt very considerable experience in large iron and steel operations, but others tell a different story. The right hon. Baronet opposite is prepared with a totally different story, and Mr. Hugh Bell, a great authority on the subject, also tells a different story. I am no defender of dumping where any of our industries is deliberately attacked. I stated that to my colleagues and to the Prime Minister. All I do say is that I do not believe you can devise anything to effectually dispose of dumping. But if there is an attack on any one of our great industries we should be bound to protect it. The question may be asked, "If you do not object to the principle of retaliation, and if you are prepared to deal with dumping, and if you would not remain content in a case where our Colonies were attacked in consequence of allowing us a preference, why did you resign? You are in agreement with the policy of the Government expressed by the President of the Board of Trade." Yes, but the policy of the Government when I left went much further than that. No doubt there was misunderstanding, and I will not enter into that except to say that in a case of that kind there should have been no possibility of misunderstanding. I ask any Gentleman who has been a member of a Cabinet whether he can conceive a Prime Minister's coming down to his Cabinet on such a vital question as that without disclosing his whole mind to all his Cabinet, so that they might be enabled to arrive at a conclusion on hearing the whole case? That is all I have to say on that point. I regret there was a misunderstanding, and in my opinion there ought to have been no room for misunderstanding.

Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton said he thought some explanation was desirable, and even necessary, from those Ministers who had resigned as to the cause of their resignations. I do not intend to say anything more on the very delicate and difficult question of what occurred at the moment of resignation; but I am bound to refer in this House to certain matters which preceded the final stage, because I have been subjected to a good deal of criticism—criticism which was often not correct and oftimes very unjust; and I feel bound to state to the House — what, indeed, I have said elsewhere on more than one occasion—the circumstances in which my colleagues and I began to diverge, The original proposal was that the corn tax should be used for preference. Naturally, before going to South Africa, my right hon. friend the late Colonial Secretary desired that the matter should be settled. Well, I declined. My right hon. friend went away in November. I declined to assent to the proposal for two reasons. First, I declined to make any forecast months beforehand of what I might be able to do at the time of introducing the Budget. I never heard of such a thing being done before. I have been in Cabinets for many years and I have listened while Chancellors of the Exchequer propounded their proposals, but I have never heard of a Chancellor of the Exchequer being asked to settle in November what he was going to do at the next Budget. But, of course, my main objection was one of policy. I felt, though it seemed a small matter, it was the beginning of one of very great importance and leading, in my opinion, to taxation of food of all kinds, and ultimately, if it were to be acceptable to the Colonies, of raw material. That was bound to lead to protection. My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade suggested it would be possible to be in favour of preference and yet opposed to protection. I differ from him. If, by a tax, corn is protected it will be impossible to refuse a demand for the protection of all other industries. I will do the late Colonial Secretary the justice to say that he did not disguise at all that it was a policy satisfactory for the moment, but mainly satisfactory as a promise of other things to come. For these reasons I declined to assent to the corn tax being used for the inauguration of a preferential and protective tariff, at least without the country being consulted. When the late Colonial Secretary returned a final decision had to be taken. Now, my right hon. friend, very unfairly I consider, in a speech he made somewhere, charged me with "rushing" my colleagues on the subject. We were compelled to choose, he said, between agreeing to the proposal to abolish the corn tax and accepting the resignation of our Chancellor of the Exchequer, and we could not lose him the day before the Budget. Well, if I had been guilty of conduct of that kind I should properly have deserved reprobation. It would have been perfectly unjustifiable to have put a pistol to the head of my colleagues and say, "Either abandon preference or I go" twenty-four hours before I had to deal with the Budget. That would have been monstrous conduct on my part. My right hon. Friend returned on 14th March, a Cabinet Council was held on 25th March, the Budget Council on 31st March, another Cabinet Council on 22nd April, and the Budget was introduced on 23rd April. The whole of that time my colleagues, and, indeed, the Prime Minister long before, were in possession of my firm determination not to remain in office if the corn tax was to be used for preference. I have said that incorrect statements were made about this, and my attention has been drawn to the resumés of the year which appeared in The Times and Standard, in which it was stated that I said I would resign if the corn tax was not taken off. That was not the case. If my colleagues had not agreed with me about the remission of the corn tax it is not a subject upon which I should have considered myself at all justified in resigning. What I did say was that I would not as Chancellor of the Exchequer inaugurate this preferential movement, which I considered fraught with the gravest danger, however much I desired to draw this country into closer union with the Colonies, and if my colleagues thought otherwise then they would have to find another Chancellor of the Exchequer. Then began the fiscal campaign, during which preference blossomed into protection pure and simple; speeches were made in that direction in and out of Parliament, and pamphlets by the million were distributed under the supervision of my right hon. friend. I know that the Prime Minister thought that this kind of thing might go on and not break up the Cabinet. But that was not my opinion; in my opinion the position would have been intolerable. I considered it necessary as Chancellor of the Exchequer to come to the House and repudiate in the strongest terms any association with the proposals which were being made by the late Colonial Secretary throughout the length and breadth of the land. The fiscal campaign proceeded. There was no evidence whatever put before myself or my colleagues who had resigned their offices that preference and food taxation had been definitively abandoned, and—this is one of the strongest points—no evidence before us that the Colonial Secretary was not to continue his campaign. In these circumstances nothing remained for me or my colleagues, if we were to retain our self-respect, but to resign our offices. Party loyalty would have prompted me to submit to much, but where I believe that the interests and well-being of the country are inconsistent with adhesion to Party I cannot hesitate as to the course it is my duty to adopt. At any sacrifice to myself, what I believe to be the interest of the country must prevail. There is no other course open to a public man if public life is to remain pure, as, thank God, it has hitherto been in this country. Great as have been the sacrifices my friends and I have had to make—and how great they have been only those who have made such sacrifices can thoroughly appreciate—I am glad to think that in the result they have not been made in vain.

*MR. RANDLES (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said he thought the proposals made by the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich on the previous evening, when he offered to refrain from voting against them, on condition that the Government should discipline their Party, and put pressure on the Conservative organisations throughout the country to suppress the opinion of the great majority of the Party in the interests of a small minority, offered very little reward to the Government for the course he suggested they should take. The hon. Member for the Colne Valley had on the previous day indicated that, so far as he knew, the iron and steel trade was in a flourishing condition. The hon. Member was associated with a branch of that industry which was not prosperous, that was to say, in the manufacture of steel rails. Now, most of the rails made in the United Kingdom were made in North Lancashire and in West Cumberland, and at the present moment that industry was depressed. Thousands of persons engaged in that manufacture were now in poverty and want, employment not having been possible in more than one month out of the last three. Along the coast there are fifty blast furnaces, not more than one-third in full blast. Each of these furnaces means £20,000 a year to railway companies for carriage, as well as large sums in wages to ore and coal miners, brick-makers and scores of minor industries. English manufacturers—who had found markets in Russia, Germany, France, and America—had been driven out of all such markets by hostile tariffs. They had next transferred their goods to Canada, South Africa and to South America; and now our manufacturers, owing to depression in the United States, were driven forth once more in search of new markets. Without these export markets we could not give permanent employment to those engaged in the steel and iron trade. Dumping was perhaps more prejudicial to British manufacturers in neutral markets, where they might expect fair play, than it was in the home market. No ingenuity on the part of British manufacturers, no plant, however modern and up to date, would enable them to overcome a tariff wall which was expressly designed to exclude them from a market. If the Government could show him how, by retaliation, they could remove the effect of those tariff walls he should be quite satisfied to rest there. It was a real danger that we might, step by step, market after market, lose the outlet for those manufactures which were the very life of our industrial population, and he viewed with considerable concern the effect which the deliberate policy of foreign and, if they liked, of Colonial Governments was having upon the exclusion of our manufactures from the markets of the world. Traders and manufacturers wanted to secure a wider market, a freer trade. The Government had to look out and find fresh markets for our industries. We read in the papers that so much gold had been shipped from South Africa to London and that so many American heiresses had arrived in the Metropolis. They were interesting announcements, no doubt, but it was small comfort to the working man or his family who could buy no bread because their employment was gone owing to foreign dumping in our markets. What they wanted was free trade everywhere, but, like the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was in no sense a bigoted free trader. He should like to see outputs growing and spreading every day, for they must recollect that our home trade was not sufficient to keep our people employed. It was facts such as these that we ought to keep in view. They should remember the saying of the ancient Greek who remarked that the man who got the best iron would soon take all the gold from Crœsus.

Sir EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): The hon. Member who has just sat down said quite truly that he was not a bigoted free-trader. In that I am sure we all agree. He made an interesting speech because he gave us at first hand some definite information with regard to certain industrial facts. Now we want to get facts at first hand; they are always welcome to this House. But the hon. Member did not succeed, in my opinion, in drawing any very definite conclusion from those facts. It is the conclusion from the facts on which everything depends. He told us that certain steel industries were not doing well. I have no doubt it is so, but what is the reason why they are not doing well? Why, Sir, the reason was given really by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon. He pointed out that our capital has been greatly depleted by what we have spent on the war. It has been greatly depleted. Everybody knows it is exceedingly difficult to borrow money, and everybody connected with large businesses knows perfectly well that large businesses are holding their hands with regard to capital expenditure because of the difficulty of raising money. All that makes for contraction of trade.

Mr. RANDLES said his point was, not that the volume of trade was contracting, but that orders were being given to foreigners and we were losing orders.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I understood that the hon. Member's point was that there was contraction of trade here, and the United States were doing our trade. Any one listening to the hon. Member would have imagined that, in his opinion, there is no contraction of trade in the United States. In the last autumn the output of steel in the United States has been reduced by from 40 to 60 per cent.

Mr. RANDLES said that was the reason which he gave why the United States had come into our market—because there was depression in the United States.

Sir EDWARD GREY: I said they had reduced the output—they are not making so much. They have got a depression or reduction of trade at least as severe as ours at home. Protection has not saved them from that. And they are "dumping" their goods. Where are they "dumping" them? Into Canada, according to the hon. Member's own showing, a country with high protective duties. Therefore protective duties do not save them from "dumping," because, on his own showing, Canada has suffered (from his point of view) from the "dumping" of American goods. That is where I dispute the conclusions which the hon. Member has drawn. He will excuse me if I do not proceed to deal with the rest of his case, because I think most of it was included in the ground covered by the Secretary to the Board of Trade, who spoke yesterday, and to that I am coming presently. Now this debate is not only a long debate, but a very interesting one. There are so many points of view to be represented. There is, of course, the Opposition point of view, which on this occasion, no doubt, does include the general feeling of the Opposition to the Government. But it is more than that. It is not merely our common disagreement with the Government; it is our real and deep apprehension that there is on that side of the House a policy which is making for national disaster. But, besides our point of view, there are hon. Members on the other side of the House who want to avoid voting against the Government if they can, and hon. Members who want to vote with the Government, but find a difficulty in doing so. Then there are the protectionists, who will vote for the Government willingly, because at present they have nothing better to vote for, and there are, I suppose, some Members who will vote for the Government policy because they really approve of it. Well. Sir, of all these different points of view I think the Government policy is the least interesting, it is the least intelligible, and I venture to think, it is the least important.

But what is very important is the conduct of the Government. Not only this House, but the colleagues of the Government and the country, ever since this question was raised have suffered from the misunderstandings and confusion which have arisen. We know that last session there was a misunderstanding.

We were invited to a discussion in this House, and then were told that we could not have it except on a vote of censure. I need not dwell on the painful misunderstanding which came early in the autumn, to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon and the noble Lord the Member for Ealing have referred, which has left a painful impression in our public life. How have these misunderstandings come about? They have come about, in my opinion, from this—that the Government will treat this question of fiscal policy, not as a question of principle, not as a question of right or wrong, but as a question of tactics. We have not had, I am afraid, the last of the misunderstandings yet. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol is going to vote for the Government because he is satisfied with their policy. He approves of the course which they are steering. I am not surprised that he approves of the Government's course, but I am surprised at his confidence in thinking that course will be maintained. He remains on board the ship because for the moment the course which is being steered is one of which he approves. But the hon. Member for Darlington told him yesterday that five-sixths, in his opinion, of the Party opposite disapprove of that course, and intend to change it; and when it is changed they will throw the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol overboard. I trust that, if that happens, he will not be above accepting a helping hand even from an unexpected quarter. The course of the Government meets with his approval now, and they have undertaken a responsibility in regard to it. They are going to have his vote on what understanding? On the understanding, if there is anything in understandings at all, not merely that that is their course now, but that that is the course they mean to stand by for a reasonable time—they mean to stand by their announced policy, not for an hour or a day, but at least for the next election. What is that policy? Not the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Every one knows the statement of the President of the Board of Trade that if an appeal were made to the electors and a majority were returned in favour of the Government policy that would not entitle them to go further and carry out a policy of preference. From the point of view of exclusion—the negative side of the Government policy—the Government have been perfectly explicit, and if an election were to take place today and a Parliament elected which contained a majority supporting them the Government would be precluded during that Parliament from dealing with preference, and, I understand, from dealing with protection also. That is not, I am bound to warn the President of the Board of Trade, the opinion held by many of his supporters. The Prime Minister desires a change in public opinion which will render the adoption of preference possible. If, a few months or a year hence, the Government were to say that the change which they desired had taken place and preference were to be included in the policy before the country at the next election, every one will feel, after what has passed, that there had been a breach of faith, at any rate, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. I do not accuse the Government of any intention of not going through with their declared policy of fighting the next election on liberty to negotiate only, and excluding preference and protection. But it is beyond their power to keep the issue to that. They cannot make that the only issue; they cannot make it the chief issue before the country. Can they prevent the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham from being before the country, and can they separate him from his policy? Does not every one know that he announced his policy by saying that he was "in for a big fight?" Yes, Sir, it is a big fight, and, so far, the Government have declared no policy with regard to this fight except that of neutrality. Sir, it is the policy of Korea in the war between Russia and Japan, and it is worth about as much for the purposes of practical politics. The whole question is, not what the Government policy is, but, in this fight between the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and those who disagree with him, which side do the Government mean to take? The right hon. Gentleman is going to fight the next election on his policy. On which side is the Government going to fight? Are they going to fight for him or against him? Are they going to wait to see whether he wins before they fight at all? The President of the Board of Trade reproached us on this side of the House with being fiscal policy Quakers. Fiscally, he made a fighting speech. But did it not occur to him that his most dangerous foes are those of his own household? Did it not occur to him that the fight is raging now, and the question which the country is asking is—On which side is victory to be? Are they going to stand aside at the critical moment and take no part in the fight? No, they are taking a part in the fight—some of them. The President of the Local Government Board has taken part in the fight. He wishes to rob his own Government of one of the supporters of their policy in order to add to the supporters of the Birmingham policy, which is not that of the Government.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. WALTER LONG, Bristol, S.): No.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Surely he has opposed a supporter of the Government policy as declared by the President of the Board of Trade. He has opposed the hon. Baronet the Member for Wiltshire in the interests, not of this side of the House, but in the interests of a supporter of the Birmingham policy. He is so generous that he wishes to rob his own Government of a supporter of their policy in order to add one to the supporters of a policy which is not theirs. Surely, if the Government are to play a part which is worthy of any Government, they must discontinue giving their support to candidates who support a policy which is not theirs, or else, after the next election, they may be in this position—they may find that the policy which is now excluded from their own has obtained a majority in the next Parliament, and they will have to say, "Yes, we are very sorry; it was not our policy, but all the candidates whom we supported were in favour of that policy and we must now give way to circumstances which we could not help." That will not be an honourable or worthy position. But if the Government are to re-establish themselves, one thing more they must do. They must stop the flow of individual opinion, and give us more of the collective opinion of the Government. We seem to be getting nothing but individual opinions; but we have a right to have the opinion of the Government and not a mere collection of the opinions of individuals. Even the President of the Board of Trade, though he did speak largely for the Government, spoke also largely an individual opinion, and he has been followed by the Secretary to the Board of Trade, who, having begun by saying that the Government had placed a policy before the country, then devoted an exhaustive speech to defending the policy which was not that of the Government, but the policy of protection.

To protection I will come presently. First let me have a word on the policy of liberty of negotiation, which I observe includes retaliation. Their policy is that liberty of negotiation must be backed by retaliation, or else it is not worth anything. On that they say they must have an election before they can have liberty of negotiation. I do not think that is a proper way of dealing with the question at all. I will not labour the point because the right hon. Gentleman has already raised it. Do they consider the Sugar Convention Bill an example of the policy of retaliation or not? It is often quoted as an example on their side. If it is there is no need to go to the country before presenting us with another example. If it is not an example let them cease to quote it. I do not object in the least to talk about liberty of negotiation and retaliation. I believe with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, who laid down three conditions. I once laid down five conditions myself, but three of them are the same, and I abide by his conditions, I do not object to what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol said with regard to retaliation. He says he has no objection to it in principle, nor have I. He says he can imagine many instances in which it would be unprofitable or worse for this country, and so can I. He also says he can imagine many instances in which it would be useful to this country, but there I differ with him, and until he states those instances I can only be content with saying that I have less imagination than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, but I think I may say I have an open mind on the subject. We have got no question before us of retaliation at this moment, and with all respect to the Secretary to the Board of Trade, I say he did not provide a very convincing instance that retaliation has succeeded. We want facts to go on. In history, where it has been tried, other countries have raised their duties against each other; they have marched up the hill and found it unpleasant, and then they have marched down, and after much suffering, after the operation of the war was over, found that trade was improved. Give me an instance in which the eventual gain has been greater than the loss incurred by the contesting countries. I have not got that instance yet. These protectionist countries, with their weapons loaded, had no more effect on the Dingley and McKinley tariffs than free trade. Germany was as helpless with the McKinley tariff as we were. In the year after the McKinley tariff was imposed the German exports increased by 34 per cent., and British exports by 60 per cent. We were helpless before them, we both suffered from the blow, but Great Britain recovered with more elasticity and vigour than the protectionist countries. Surely on the Government policy we have nothing to discuss. If you go to the country there is nothing to discuss, because you cannot discuss retaliation without a case before you. You could not go to the country on liberty to go to war without saying whom you are to go to war with. If you go to the country on a policy of liberty to go to war I should say that I agree entirely with the policy that the Government should have liberty to go to war, on one condition, and that is that they would get the authority of Parliament first. If you go to the country on liberty to negotiate, or retaliation, you have nothing to discuss, and all I contend for is that you shall not retaliate without coming to Parliament first for authority. If that really be the policy of the Government as the President of the Board of Trade describes this abstract liberty to negotiate and retaliate—if that really be their policy—then I say that the President of the Board of Trade is infinitely nearer to us on this side of the House than he is to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. If his policy is only that abstract liberty to negotiate and retaliate, and if it excludes the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, then he is much nearer to us than the Birmingham policy. He said that he differs not at all from the objects of the Birmingham policy, but with the methods. We can all say that too. What are the alleged objects? More goodwill and closer union with the Colonies. More prosperity for British trade. Those are the objects of all of us. It is not a difference about objects, but it is the methods which form the whole difficulty. The objects we all agree with, but the methods we dread because they will not secure the objects, in fact they would be disastrous to those objects. The Commission which is now sitting is not engaged in drawing up a tariff for hypothetical retaliation, but it is drawing up a permanent tariff, and one which is intended to be permanent. When the Secretary for the Board of Trade was speaking, the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich asked him, in the course of his speech, whether the Government intended it to be a permanent tariff, and the hon. Member replied quite simply and frankly that, as an Under-Secretary, he could not go further into the policy of the Government. Everybody who has been an Under-Secretary will accept that answer as adequate. Everybody who has been a member of a Government knows the high value which is placed upon the reticence of Under-Secretaries, but the question did not disturb the Secretary to the Board of Trade in the least. He quite rightly said he could not answer, but I do not think he minded the question. He wants a permanent tax, and if he does not get it from the present Government he is looking forward to get it from someone else, and this unofficial Commission is engaged in drawing up a tariff. I can imagine what the proceedings at that Commission will be, what wrestling and wrangling and log-rolling there wil be before they agree. And if their tariff comes to be placed before this House for acceptance, the scenes of that Commission will become the scenes of this House, and we shall settle a tariff which will be called a scientific tariff, but which will be settled not by science, but by political log-rolling.

Let me now come to the speech of the Secretary to the Board of Trade. I entirely admit the ability of that speech, and he always excites my admiration, but he always fills me with distrust—I do not mean of his personal character, but of the soundness of his arguments. He seems to me to be a master in stating something which appears to be an answer, but which is not really an answer to what has come from this side of the House. He said we attached too much importance to the cheapness of goods. He said trade is better when prices are high, and bad when prices are low. That sounds very well, but it is entirely irrelevant to our point. Trade is good when prices are rising only when the rise comes from the expansion of the natural demand for goods. Protection might raise prices, and yet it would not make good trade, and why? Because the rise in price is to come not from the expansion of a natural demand, but from restricting the supply. Supposing by some unimaginable catastrophe, the output of iron and steel was reduced by one half and could not be expanded, you would have a rise in prices but very bad trade. The Secretary to the Board of Trade dealt with the question of the excess of exports over imports, and he quoted the United States as a prosperous country. How does he account for that great excess of exports over imports? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon answered that point, and answered it completely. May I ask the Secretary to the Board of Trade if he wishes to see our exports exceed our imports? If he does, there is one way in which it can be brought about. Let us embark in another great war. Let us have to borrow some hundreds of millions until we are unable to raise it in this country, and have to raise it abroad, and then our exports will exceed our imports because they will have to go to pay our debts, and no one on the other side will stand up and say that our trade is good then. Free imports are in our opinion one of the essential conditions to our present prosperity. I am reluctant to trouble the House with quotations, and I will not give one from Cobden, but I must return to what the expectations of those who introduced free trade were, and how they have been realised, and I would commend this extract to the Secretary of the Board of Trade, who has been studying the history of that time. Here is what Sir Robert Peel said in carrying free trade. Did he look forward to our remaining the sole manufacturing country in the world, and other countries supplying us with raw materials? On the contrary, he looked forward to more severe competition, after the time of free trade, in manufactured goods with foreign countries than we had ever known before. He says—

> "The continuance of permanent peace will expose us to more extensive and more formidable competition with foreign nations with respect to manufactures. During war we commanded the supply of nations. Peace has introduced not only new consumers but also formidable manufacturing interests. In order that we may retain our pre-eminence, it is of the greatest importance that we neglect no opportunity of securing to ourselves those advantages by which that pre-eminence can alone be secured. Sir, I firmly believe that abundance and cheapness of provisions is one of the constituents by which the continuance of manufacturing and commercial pre-eminence can be maintained."

Conditions have changed since that time. That is true, but in my opinion they have changed in the sense of making those words even more true and more necessary to us than they were at the time they were spoken. We build more ships in a year than all the rest of the world put together, an extraordinary fact for an island of this size with a population of this size, more ships not merely than the greatest country in the world in size and population, not merely than a group of countries, but than all the world put together. I am astonished at the fact. Some hon. Members who support the Birmingham policy appear also to be astonished at the fact for another reason. They seem to be astonished that any other countries build any ships at all. I am astonished at the amount we do. Does anybody really believe that free imports have had nothing to do with that extraordinary success? Some of the hopes of the original free-traders have not been realised, yet by far the greater part of them have been, and some results which they never hoped for and could hardly have imagined at that time have been realised.

Now how would protection work? Is it going to give more employment and higher wages? Take the instance given by my right hon. friend the Member for Wolverhampton. He gave the instance of steel imported from the United States—dumped I suppose—which is used in this country to make steel tubes which are again exported to the United States. What is the protectionist theory? That the United States steel ought never to have come here at all, that it displaced so much employment in this country. Very well, keep it out, put the price up to a price which will satisfy Mr. Brailsford or some other great expert in the matter, some one whose works, for whatever reason, are not doing as well as he expects. Keep out the American steel. How do you know that the steel tubes would be made at all, and if they were not made at all there would be no demand for the corresponding steel in this country, and by keeping it out, so far from giving extra employment, you would have destroyed the employment of the steel tube trade, and you would not get extra employment in the steel trade because you would have diminished the demand for it at home. So also in the case of ships. Keep out your dumped steel plates. Well, they will go to other countries. Protection will not keep them out of other countries, because the hon. Member for Cockermouth, who has just sat down, complained that dumped American goods go into Canada. They will go to other countries and our shipbuilding trade will not maintain its pre-eminence, because we shall have given up that exceptional advantage which distinguishes us from other enterprising nations who might build ships in competition with us. Yes, that is where I think hon. Members fail to see the point when they say that producers and consumers ought to be classed together. They say we are wrong in drawing a distinction between producers and consumers. Well, in a sense they must be classed together. Their interests are the same. The producers in the shipbuilding trade are the consumers in the steel trade, and the interests of consumers and producers both together make for the policy of free imports. It has not been proved that protectionist countries without free imports can really manufacture more cheaply than we can do. The Secretary to the Board of Trade gave a case which will be within the recollection of the House, of how by being secure of the home market, as well as having the field in the open market, you can produce more cheaply by extending your works. That was a hypothetical case. It is not proved that it is really the fact that they produce more cheaply. If you can give one trade that advantage and one trade alone, if you can guarantee to one trade the home market, and say: "You shall have free imports of all you require and be secure in the possession of the home market." I think that would be true. But then you cannot do that for one trade alone, and what we contend is that under protection the loss by having to pay more for your half-manufactured raw material, and the loss incurred through rings and trusts, more than takes away the advantage which the producer acquires from having his home market guaranteed to him. Does the Secretary to the Board of Trade really believe that the protectionist country has the free-trade country at its mercy? If he does he must wish that we should not only become protectionist, but that the United States should become free trade. It used to be a commonplace on both sides that if the United States became free trade our manufacturers would be more hardly run in the competition of the world. That is what follows from the argument of the Secretary to the Board of Trade. We have had many statements, some of them perfectly true, that all is not well with our trade, but we do not get it proved that protection would be any remedy. That is where the protectionist case falls through. We have had the Secretary to the Board of Trade and the hon. Member for Cockermouth giving instances of trades that are not doing well. Yes, Sir, but I think the evils are exaggerated. Undoubtedly you can find industries which are not doing well, and industries which are falling off. But it is not proved that protection is a remedy. A ruined industry is not in itself evidence that the country is doing badly. You may go to any great city and be told that there used to be a trade there which does not now exist; but you will find that the city has grown and that it is richer and more populous than it was. And what do you find? Why over and over again you will find that trades have disappeared—poor trades paying low wages and making small profits—and that they have been killed, not by foreign competition, but by the rise of other and more profitable trades paying higher wages.

I turn to the question of colonial preference. I spoke of misunderstandings. Misunderstandings between members of the Government are nothing in mischief compared with misunderstandings between ourselves and the Colonies. This policy is to bind the Empire together. Without it we are told that the Empire will fall to pieces. We treat the Colonies well to-day and they recognise it freely. They recognise the advantage of the Imperial connection. Our Fleet, our whole resources, are at their disposal. A small matter in which a small colony is interested is a matter which the whole of our resources may be used to support. Our diplomatic and Consular services are at their disposal, our whole machinery of Government is theirs, and we press them for nothing in return, and rightly so. What they give us we take gladly, but we do not press them and they treat us well. Everybody knows in this country that we recognise freely and gladly what the Colonies have done for us, and if this goodwill were crowned by free trade within the Empire, no doubt it would be a grand thing. But that is not a bargain. That is throwing down all barriers once and for all, and unfortunately that is not in question at the present time. It is not before this country, it is not before any colony, it is not in contemplation in the Birmingham policy. The Colonies think they are being asked in return for the Birmingham policy for what? Not for free trade within the Empire, but simply that they should raise their duties against the foreigner. I am much more interested in the duties which the Colonies impose on British goods then in the duties they impose on foreign goods. I would much rather not ask them, "Will you raise your duties against foreigners?" but "Will you lower your duties on British goods?" They have told us quite plainly that they cannot do so. The Canadian Finance Minister has told us that Canada cannot further lower her duties on British goods. Mr. Deakin has told us the same for Australia, and that free trade within the Empire was impracticable. Mr. Deakin has gone further and has explained that preference may mean on the part of the Colonies not a lowering of duties but a raising of duties. He said that before giving a preference to the mother country the South African Federation raised their duties 25 per cent., and that if Australia could take the same step it would not be condemned. Sir, that is a dangerous misunderstanding. The Secretary for the Colonies has been quoting Carlyle and Ruskin lately. There was nothing Carlyle denounced more than the danger of a cash nexus. It is a cash nexus we have been asked to establish between ourselves and our Colonies. We are not drawing them towards free trade by the Birmingham policy, but they are drawing us towards protection. It is an essential condition in their minds that they should be left free under preference to protect their own manufacturers against British competition, and then give us much more protection against the foreigner, if you please. But that is not what this country thinks is before it. The country has been led to suppose that, under the Birmingham policy, the Colonies will lower their duties and admit British goods on lower terms. There is where the danger of the misunderstanding comes in, and there is where the Colonies and we are being deceived, and the reaction after great expectations will do more harm to the Imperial connection than people conceive possible. What we want to do is to be perfectly plain to the Colonies in this matter, to admit that if they choose to be protective they are free to remain protective. But get this question back on to sober, sensible lines and let them rely on the goodwill and sympathy with which we regard their progress and prosperity—goodwill and sympathy are weak words—the joy and pride with which we regard their progress and prosperity. We see nations jealous [of each other, thinking that the prosperity of one is a damage to another We see in the British Empire a number of separate independent units, for that is what they are, looking on the prosperity of each, independent though it be, with joy and pride, and that is the unique thing in the British Empire. I dread the effect which may have been brought about already from the disappointment which will come when the Colonies thoroughly understand that the idea in the minds of people over here is that we are to press them towards free trade before they are ready to take a step in that direction.

I agree with my right hon. friend the Member for Forest of Dean that we must not make too much of the prosperity argument. Our first business is to defeat this disastrous policy. Do not let that blind us to what remains to be done. Depend upon it that if you embark on this policy of tariffs the scramble which will take place will drive out the discussion of these social problems. All we contend for is that in the last two generations we have made progress, more slowly than people would like, but still progress, and we see the possibility of progress, and we are convinced that the conditions of life will become better. The distribution of wealth will become more evenly distributed provided we do not interfere with the prosperity of the country. But to maintain the prosperity of the country is the essential condition of progress; and it is because we believe that this policy will damage the prosperity of the country, and will not only demoralise our politics and depress our trade, but postpone indefinitely any question of social reform, that I shall support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. WALTER LONG: I very much regret that before I offer to the House the few remarks I desire to make on the Amendment under consideration, I have to deal with a personal matter which has been referred to by so many speakers in the debate, and especially by the right hon. Baronet whose eloquent speech has just been delivered. I am accused of having gone down to the country to support a candidate who is a supporter of what is known as the tariff reform policy, and to oppose a Gentleman who is a supporter of the Leader of the Government. I have been attacked, not only by the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition, and others, but by my noble friend the Member for Greenwich, who has put his case into the clearest and most forcible terms; and I do feel that my noble friend ought to have hesitated before he made so grave a charge against me of using my position as a Minister and departing from the best traditions of public life, and ought to have ascertained that he was accurate in his facts. My noble friend laid down the conditions for himself, and I take them as he laid them down. In his speech last night the hon. Member for Greenwich said—

> "There was an instance of something stronger than paradox. That a Minister should go down and oppose a Conservative Member for the sake of a policy which his Leader had not adopted, and which his colleagues had now repudiated—should oppose one who had been a supporter of him so long as he was loyal to the faith of the Party; that, indeed, was a violation of all the traditions of Party Government and of the best traditions of public life."

Well, if I had acted as the right hon. Baronet stated, or as my noble friend, suggests, I confess I would have been surprised myself; and I am bound to trouble the House with a reference to the actual facts which occurred. The dissatisfaction expressed by the constituency of my hon. friend the Member for the Chippenham Division of Wiltshire, for his action in Parliament, had been manifested in many ways, and, as he knows, for a considerable time before the fiscal policy was ever introduced.

SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER: I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. friend, but I cannot accept his statement. Discontent with my action and attitude has never been expressed from any public point of view, but only by the official organ of the Conservative Party.

MR. WALTER LONG: I did not intend to convey the suggestion that there had been an official meeting of the Party, and I wish to disclaim the smallest desire to do any injustice to my hon. friend. He and I are much too old personal friends for that. But I will say that my hon.

friend, in addressing his constituents with a courage and candour which, in my judgment, did him infinite credit, and which I should have expected of him, did not limit himself to fiscal reform, but stated that he condemned the policy of the Government in regard to education and also in regard to the administration of the Army and military matters. My hon. friend further, in a very remarkable sentence, admitted that he had been a first-class misdemeanant, and said that he did not propose to trouble his constituents with the long list of his offences under the head of local government and other similar questions. It was upon that statement that action was taken by my hon. friend's constituents, who started the candidature of a gentleman, not as a supporter of fiscal reform, but as a supporter of His Majesty's Government.

Sir J. DICKSON-POYNDER: I do not want to unnecessarily interrupt my right hon. friend, but I cannot accept the account he has given. I hope that I may be permitted an opportunity later on of replying to the right hon. Gentleman. [Cries of "Go on."] Well, if I may be permitted, I will give the House my version of the case. At the meeting to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, I told the Association that I had taken certain action in this House last year with regard to the Army scheme of the Government, and in that action many Members on my own side associated themselves much more prominently and ably than I did; but the best vindication of my action was the fact that in the autumn shuffle of the Government three Ministers who were responsible for that scheme were left out and three others put in their place. Since there has been an alteration in the Army scheme I have not had the desire, or the inclination, to say one single word against the Army administration of the Government. With regard to education, when the Bill was before the House I did not vote for any Amendment against it, nor did I actively oppose it at any of its stages; but I pointed out that I thought the provisions dealing with the voluntary schools were not tenable under the altered conditions, and could not last; that they were not practicable, and would shortly have to be altered. There are many Members, I believe, on this side of the House who hold a similar opinion.

Mr. WALTER LONG: I do not quite understand why my hon. friend interrupted me, because he has only confirmed the original statement I made. He expressed with courage and clearness to the meeting of the Conservative Association his objections to the Government policy on two very substantial questions, education and Army reform, and said that on these questions he proposed to adopt the Radical view. It was because of my hon. friend's views on general questions, outside fiscal reform, that the local association decided that he no longer represented their views. So anxious, however, was the chairman of the Association to find a bridge for my hon. friend that he corresponded with him, and endeavoured to get him to declare that he would be a supporter of the Unionist Party at the next election on their general policy. I hope that my hon. friend does not dispute that?

Sir J. DICKSON-POYNDER: When I know what the policy is.

Mr. WALTER LONG: If my hon. friend had declared his intention of standing as a Unionist or Conservative supporter of the Government he would have had the widest field. If his opposition had been confined to fiscal reform, nothing would have induced me to oppose him. Further, I venture to say that if the hon. Gentleman had made such a declaration as that suggested to him, or such a declaration as had been made by my noble friend the Member for Greenwich last night, there would have been no opposition to him by any members of the Party, and certainly not by the Government. So far as I am personally concerned, I am entitled to say that I am a resident in the county represented by my hon. friend, an elector in his division, and a member of the Association, and that I acted in what I believed to be the right way, and in conformity with what I believed to be custom and practice. I do not think I deserve the charge which was brought against me by my noble friend the Member for Greenwich.

I pass from that explanation, which I was bound to make, of my own conduct and action, to the Amendment which is under discussion. I am bound to say, having been an attentive listener to this debate, that I heard the speech of the right hon. Baronet who has just spoken with peculiar satisfaction. The right hon. Baronet always makes eloquent and powerful contributions to our debates, and generally makes a practical suggestion at the end of them. In the debate to which we have been listening there has been a singular want of practical suggestion on the part of those who have been criticising His Majesty's Government. The Government, they say, have no policy of their own. They then endeavour to show that the declarations of the Prime Minister at Sheffield and Manchester have been altered by something which has taken place since, or by speeches in this House, and they then turn to a general attack upon and condemnation of that which is not the policy of the Government but which is the scheme of the ex-Colonial Secretary. I have been attacked in the course of these debates more or less severely because of certain statements I have made during the recess in my constituency and elsewhere; and it has been said that I ought not to have remained a member of the Government if I were prepared to make such statements. I confess I am astonished at any comment of that kind having been passed. Believing, as I do, that this scheme of drawing closer together the Colonies and the mother country, of which there are many advocates on that side of the House as on this, is one which I think to be worth considerable sacrifices to carry out, if it could be worked out properly, and if the Colonies were able to make satisfactory replies to our proposals—I am not dealing now with the question of proposals but with the future of the scheme as a whole—and, holding that view, I think it would not be candid, or that I should not be playing a proper part, if I had not told my constituents and others who did me the honour to listen to me what my views were. Surely the question whether I should remain in the Government or not is not a question that those outside the Government, who can know but little of what passes between colleagues—and I say that deliberately because we heard a great deal to-day at second and third hand—I am not of course referring to my right hon. friend the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer—I am referring to suggestions made as to conversations between Ministers—surely the question whether it was right or not that I should remain a member of the Cabinet was a question for the Prime Minister and myself. I need hardly say to the House of Commons in which I have had the honour of sitting for a great many years and which is as good a judge of personal character as any Assembly or gathering of men in the world, that, however low the House of Commons may rank my powers to discharge the duties which have fallen upon me since I have been here, I am confident they will not charge me with action unworthy of an English gentleman such as I should have been guilty of had I remained in the Government, no longer being in agreement with my colleagues.

I pass from that to the Amendment. After all, it is good Party fighting to bring charges against Ministers of making conflicting statements, and it is perfectly legitimate that right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite should do their best to weaken our position if, in anything we have said we have not acted as we ought to have acted. I must, however, repeat what has been said more than once, namely, that I am more and more astonished as the debate has progressed at the determination of right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite to carry it on in the absence of the Prime Minister. Surely that conviction must have been forced on right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen themselves. Almost every speaker has gone into matters, has made demands, and has pressed questions which every man who has been in a Cabinet knows can only with propriety be answered by the head of the Government himself. In the absence of the Prime Minister the debate has lost nearly all its interest and value. I feel, however, from my own point of view that, great though the loss has been which has been sustained by the absence of the Prime Minister, there is one very good reason to rejoice that the debate has taken place, and that is because it has given an occasion for the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. If there had been no other contribution to the debate than that speech I should say that the occasion had been well utilised, because my right hon. friend not only summed up the case in a manner which I am sure commanded the respect and admiration of the House of Commons, but, further, he indicated that in regard to the policy of the Government—the policy of retaliation—not only was he prepared to approve of it in certain cases but he urged its prompt adoption. We heard the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose introduced his Amendment and other speeches like that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. In both those speeches, and in many other speeches, we have heard condemnation of the Government and criticism of every proposal we have made having for its object the arrest of bad trade and the improvement of the industrial condition of the country. In the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol we have had, however, a practical suggestion, and, therefore, if we have gained nothing else from this debate we have had that advantage. We are told that the policy of the Government is an unreal policy. We are told by my noble friend the Member for Ealing that if we only mean retaliation why have all this bother and upset in the country, and that we could do it without. My right hon. friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech to-day made a statement of what took place in the Cabinet on the occasion which immediately preceded his resignation and other resignations. With reference to that statement I would only say this, I was present on those occasions and I am bound honestly to say that my memory does not exactly tally with my hon. friend's, but here I feel, and I am quite sure my right hon. friend will agree with me, that it would not be proper that anyone but the Prime Minister should deal with my right hon. friend's version of what happened. I for one regret the necessity which led my right hon. friend to leave the Cabinet, and we all listened to his statement to-day with a full realisation that we had lost valuable services. I myself lost my right hon. friend as a colleague with very great regret because he was an old guide and leader to me in my early days in the House of Commons. It is, however, impossible for me or for any other member of the Cabinet, except the Prime Minister, who alone is responsible, to deal with the question of what happened in the Cabinet. Indeed I thought it unnecessary on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton to give us, as he did. a description of what passed in the time of Sir Robert Peel in order to emphasise what he said the policy of a strong Prime Minister would be. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to attack the Prime Minister let him wait until the Prime Minister comes back, when the Prime Minister will be able to answer him, and I shall be very much surprised if the Prime Minister does not satisfy the House of Commons that the course he followed was perfectly right and proper.

It is said we have no policy at all, that the policy of retaliation is not a real one, and could be adopted without coming to the House of Commons or without the authority of a general election. I am not quite sure how it is suggested that we should proceed except by the plan we have adumbrated. Is it suggested that it should be done by Order in Council? If so, that is the very policy which right hon. Gentlemen opposite have condemned. They have demanded to know from us whether in the application of these principles the power of Parliament would be removed and they have been told that that would not be the case. They then suggest that we want no new authority and that we can do all that is necessary as regards retaliation against other countries without coming to Parliament or going to the country. I venture to say there is very little justification for that view. Technically it may be accurate that we could put in force this policy without the authority of Parliament or that of the country having been obtained at a general election. But I venture to say that if this is to be an effective weapon, if it is to be one that can be used usefully—and I believe its greatest usefulness will be found in the power of using it rather than in actually using it—it can only be so when it is known that the Government of this country have been authorised by the Parliament and people of this country to use retaliatory powers, when necessary, in order to prevent injustice being done to our own industries. Then I believe the effect of that knowledge would be almost as powerful as would be the actual imposition of retaliation. But that would be impossible unless the Government are clothed with the power and authority of Parliament and the country. That disposes of the argument that we have the power now. What is the other argument? That retaliation is useless. A great deal of the argument of this debate, and a great many of the opinions advanced and the figures quoted, must be taken after all as figurative of the opinions of different Parties holding distinctly different views, who have put forward from their side of the House what they think will justify their opposition to the policy of retaliation. Hon. Gentlemen opposite advance their own statistics in order to support their own view, but a great deal must depend on the expectations realised in the future. We, at all events, believe that retaliation is an effective weapon. The hon. Member for Glasgow, who made yesterday what I venture to say was an extremely able and interesting speech, however opinions may differ in regard to its arguments, settled that case in an extremely able manner. We believe that the statistics he advanced are correct and because we believe that the conclusions which he anticipated will be arrived at, so we think the policy of His Majesty's Government will be accepted by Parliament as a practical and sensible policy.

My hon. friend said dumping was one of the things we really had to deal with. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton said you will never stop the dumping; whatever you may do, it will go on, whatever your policy may be, whatever your powers of retaliation may be. No doubt it is perfectly true that all dumping will not be stopped, but we believe that a great deal of that dumping which has been most injurious and destructive to the industry of this country would be stopped if we have the power we ask Parliament to give us. Another argument advanced is that this dumping on the whole is rather a good thing, that we are not justified in putting an end to it. But that is not the view of the majority of practical business men so far as I have been able to ascertain, and I have endeavoured to make myself familiar with the opinion of representative men of business throughout the country, and, almost without exception, the case they put is that in many instances capital could be employed in greater amount and with greater advantage, and that greater employment could be given to the working man here if there was such interference with the practice of dumping as they believe could be effected if we had the powers of retaliation. That is the opinion of business men in this country. What was the opinion of business men in others? I find in the Industrial Commission held in America in 1900–1901 Mr. Charles Schwab, the president of the Steel Commission, described how dumping in his country, under the wall of high tariffs, enabled them to derive great advantage, and kept their manufacturers fully employed; that is to say, while in their own country they were able to sell their produce at a profit, they were also able to make a profit on goods dumped down in this country, and sold under cost. [AN HON. MEMBER: How about the Steel Trust?] I do not think that is any argument at all, because, if Mr. Schwab's evidence is trustworthy, the more steel made the more would be dumped here. All these arguments point to one conclusion, and, as my hon. friend said yesterday, all practical business men make the same demand, and surely it is worth while to try by some such means as those we have suggested to prevent this state of things, which lessens the demand for labour in this country. The right hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment said he did not dispute that there was some case made out for the consideration of a remedy for this serious state of things. Now we have been told the policy we suggest is no use, and that the policy of the late Colonial Secretary is one that would bring ruin and destruction on this country; but no other policy has been suggested although these evils admittedly exist. It may be urged by some that everything is so prosperous that it is not necessary to make any alteration, but they are only a small minority. The great majority of those who have discussed this question admit that there are evils to be removed and cured. At all events the policy of the Government is a real policy of action, while Gentlemen on the other side of the House rest themselves purely on criticism, and make no proposals of their own.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL (Oldham) said that the House would not be disposed to criticise very harshly the action of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the hon. Member for the Chippenham Division, as that action had now been explained. But surely it was not usual for Cabinet Ministers to concern themselves very much with the driving out of recalcitrant or unorthodox members from their own Party. The right hon. Gentleman said that he went down to Wiltshire in his private capacity.

MR. WALTER LONG: No.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL: It was part of the complaint against the Government that no one could ever tell whether a Minister was speaking in his private or in his official capacity. No one had been less strict than the right hon. Gentleman in confining himself to the official policy of the Government; and though he had just made a speech to which no one could take exception, in the country the right hon. Gentleman had put forth very different doctrines and employed a very different tone. It was unfortunate, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman should be the first to make an attack on one who for so many years had given him consistent support. The speech of the President of the Board of Trade seemed to take no account of the realities of the present situation, and to be remote from the real condition by which it was surrounded. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that the 10 per cent. duty proposed by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham was for revenue purposes only. Did the right hon. Gentleman believe that the ugly rush to join the Tariff Commission proceeded from any exalted enthusiasm for revenue; that those wealthy manufacturers sitting in conclave day after day, and defraying their own expenses, were there for the sole purpose of discovering a new source of revenue to balance the Budget of Imperial preference? The President of the Board of Trade had complained that the Government were abused and attacked as if they were a protectionist Government wishing to carry out a protectionist policy, and suggested that that was an unwarranted assumption, if not an invention. He would state the successive incidents which had led them to that possibly mistaken conclusion. First, the late Colonial Secretary, while a member of the Government, was permitted to make pretectionist speeches, to send protectionist letters, and to flood the country with protectionist literature. What would have been said of Sir Robert Peel if he had set up a private printing press at Tamworth? The Prime Minister had been careful in his speeches to use language which neither excluded nor discountenanced the policy advocated by the then Colonial Secretary; the Party Press had been practically unanimous in preaching protection. If the right hon. Gentleman read The Times he would have seen that very odd free-trade notions were being expressed in the newspapers which most regularly supported the Government. At by-elections protectionist candidates had stood on the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham with the full support and countenance of His Majesty's Ministers. Then there were the measures, more or less severe, which had been taken against those members of the Unionist Party who had been actively engaged in combating protection. Perhaps hon. Members were aware that he himself had to rely upon the daily Press for information as to the course of business in this House. Then there was the ejection from the Cabinet of the free-trade Ministers, whose places were taken in every case by representatives of the most extreme protectionist opinion in Parliament, and lastly, there was the appointment of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the face of these facts could it be said that they were unreasonable in imagining that there was in the country a real protectionist movement, that they were confronted with a real movement for the establishment of a general and permanent tariff, that the Government sympathised with that movement, and were prepared to aid, abet, and, if possible, profit by it? His right hon. friend had made a remarkable speech which had not received from the Party Press the attention one might have expected from the nature of the declarations it contained. He had declared that he and the Government were opposed to the principle and theory of protection; he had declared against food taxes, even after the next election; he had declared against an average 10 per cent. ad valorem duty on foreign manufactured goods; and he had stated that there was to be no retaliation without the consent of Parliament in each special and particular case. It was true the right hon. Gentleman used a lot of vague language of uncertain import to soothe the feelings of his protectionist supporters, who might not unreasonably have been disquieted by those declarations. Personally he would be quite content with the language and declarations of the President of the Board of Trade if he thought the right hon. Gentleman had power to give effect to them. If they had been made six months earlier he thought there would have been no great protectionist movement in the country, no Free Food League, no Tariff Reform Committee, no speech by the President of the Local Government Board against the hon. Member for the Chippenham Division of Wiltshire, and perhaps no resignations, or only one resignation, from the Cabinet in the autumn. But there was such a thing as making declarations too late. Not only had they been confronted with the official acts of hostility to the cause of free-trade, which he had enumerated, but free-trade Members of the Unionist Party had been threatened by the Tariff Reform League. Mr. Ratcliffe Cousins in his letter stated—

> "This League has by resolution determined to oppose the return of free-fooders, whether Unionist or Radical, and we shall use the whole of our organisation for this object.'

And a prominent member of the League, who had declared himself, heart and soul, with its objects, was now Civil Lord of the Admiralty! In face of the danger with which they conceived themselves to be confronted, the free-trade Unionists had been compelled to take steps more or less serious, and in some cases, irrevocable. They had had the unpleasant business of differing with old friends and fighting their organisations, and in some cases new organisations had had to be formed with a view to possible eventualities. The President of the Board of Trade had stated that the Government were prepared to fight for free trade. Where would free trade have been now if it had been left to the champions on the Treasury Bench? If there was in England and Scotland a strong growing and embattled opinion, ready to fight against any attempt to revert to protection, it was due to the exertions of the Liberal leaders, the exertions and sacrifices of private people who did not usually take much part in politics, and, let it never be forgotten, the sacrifices of the free-trade Ministers on the Government side of the House. These events had produced a profound impression upon the public mind, and a sensible alteration in the existing balance of Parties in the country. It would take more than one hesitating speech to remove the impression these events had caused or to avert the consequences to which they might lead.

The President of the Board of Trade had divided his speech into two parts, in one of which he spoke for himself, and in the other for the Government. So far as he spoke for himself, he (the speaker) accepted his statements unreservedly, and, as a free-trader, was grateful for his emphatic though tardy declaration of faith; but in view of what occurred since the beginning of this dispute, he could not put the same confidence in the statements which he made on behalf of the Government. While the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary to the Board of Trade, and the President of the Local Government Board remained on the Treasury Bench, he could not believe that the assurances which had been given were founded on the conscientious convictions of a united Cabinet. They seemed much more likely to be a tactical expedient suggested by the results of recent by-elections and rendered desirable by the approaching division. How could it be known that after further by-elections another Government attitude would not be taken? It could not be forgotten that the Prime Minister, when he succeeded Lord Salisbury, stated at the Carlton Club that the policy of the Conservative Party should not be altered, but within a year he declared at Sheffield that he proposed to make a fundamental alteration of the fiscal policy of the last two generations. There was not much danger of the Unionist free-traders deserting the cause of free trade. If only the issue were put plainly enough, he believed there were 100 Conservative Members who would rather go out of public life than support a definite fully-developed plan of protection. But there was a danger that in the existing uncertainty they might be induced by the difficulties of the situation, or by considerations of Party or friendship, or in the hope of conciliating doubtful friends, or of mollifying adroit antagonists, to fritter away or damage some part of the great substructure upon which the commercial system of the country depended. As his noble friend had stated, it did not rest with the Government to decide what should be the issue at the next election. It rested with them to say what should not be done before the next election, but what would be done at the election; and still more what would be done after that election they could not with certainty declare. The issue at the next election had already been fixed, as the issue of elections were often fixed, by the force of character of a powerful politician who occupied a private station apart from the political organisation of either of the Parties. The issue had been fixed, and that issue was whether this country should make the same kind of reversal of fiscal policy that Germany was persuaded to make in the 80's by Prince Bismarck.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: Hear, hear!

Mr. WINSTON CHURCHILL: Now the House had that on the highest possible authority. We were confronted with an urgent and vital issue. Ministers on the Front Bench deluded themselves. Nobody cared what might happen to any particular set of Ministers, and after the election no one would care a row of buttons what their particular opinions might have been. All these balancings, limitations, and half-pledges, these little devices by which an embarrassed Government staved off ruin from day to day would, after the next election, be swept as smooth as the sands of the shore after a flood tide. After the election, if the Member for Birmingham was in possession of a Parliamentary majority, he would dictate what the policy of the country would be. He had left the present Government because it would not accept his policy; after obtaining a mandate, was he likely to take less than he was prepared to take before? If the President of the Board of Trade, wishing, no doubt, to carry out the pledges he had given on which Unionist free-taders had recorded votes for the Government, turned up in Hansard the speech he delivered on Monday night, did he think that would alter by a hair's-breadth the policy of the ex-Colonial Secretary? It would not alter the policy, though it might, he thought, operate in a manner altogether detrimental to the right hon. Gentleman's official career. He could not help sympathising, on the first day the House met, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in having, on the first occasion when he addressed the House in the great office to which he had been called, had such a very bad chance of making a good speech. As he listened to his right hon. friend putting forth all the equivocations and generalities which constituted so large a part of the Government case, he could not help thinking that all the time his heart was on the third bench below the gangway, the headquarters of a policy which, think what they would of it, and some of them thought very ill of it, was a policy put forward with faith and courage.

He had not the smallest personal grievance against his right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham, though the course which the right hon. Gentleman had adopted might possibly end in his exclusion from that House. [Opposition cries of "No."] The right hon. Gentleman was in earnest, and believed in the cause he was fighting for, and believing that it was the best policy for the country and the Empire he was bound to take all constitutional steps necessary to secure the adoption of his policy. But he could not help feeling a certain amount of resentment against a Government, which was prepared to use to the full all the machinery of political excommunication for the sake not of a policy, a principle, or a cause, but of a mere Parliamentary dodge designed to keep in office during a few precarious months the existing Administration. He thought, in the face of tactics like that, they must be pardoned if they felt a certain amount of resentment. But it did not matter very much what the Prime Minister said now. For the next ten years the hall-mark of a Conservative would be willingness to work whole-heartedly for the policy of the Member for Birmingham. The Conservative Party had resolved to trust itself to the instinct of the right hon. Gentleman. He supposed about four years ago there was no man in this country better able to gauge and measure beforehand what great masses of the electorate were ready to do. The Conservative Party were trusting a great deal to that instinct to-day. Sometimes he wondered whether perhaps it was wrong, and whether the right hon. Gentleman had lately been so much concerned in managing affairs outside this country that the nice balance of his judgment in domestic affairs had been destroyed. He sometimes wondered whether the right hon. Gentleman might not be found celebrating the relief of Mafeking in a world which was moving on to quite different occupations. But whether his instinct was right or wrong, there was no doubt about his power. Could any hon. Gentleman who heard the speech which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham delivered last week in the debate on the war, and who watched the effect of it on the Ministerial Benches, who saw the Government supporter's admiration of that speech, doubt that so long as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham lived he would hold the Conservative Party in his grip? Could anyone doubt that those who belonged to that Party would have to accept the terms he was prepared to offer and submit to the policy which he was determined to dictate. There were some of them, and he did not think he was the only one, who were not prepared to accept those terms or submit to those tests, and in the division which was going to close this debate they would have to think as what Mr. Gladstone said in a famous debate, not for the moment only but for the years that were to come.

He would now turn from the free-trade speech of the President of the Board of Trade to the free-trade speech of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade. He did not wish to treat the retaliatory policy of the Government with any disrespect, and he would confine himself almost entirely to that particular part of it which was put forward by his hon. friend. Of course, he did not quarrel with the description of the speech as a free-trade speech, but it approached exactly the same conclusions as if the speaker had been a protectionist. He drew exactly the same conclusions, and the result of this free-trade policy if carried out would end in the establishment of duties and a general tariff which would not be wholly dissimilar from the objects which protectionists had in view. He confessed he wondered that members of the Government were so anxious to assume all these immense extensions of their functions. No doubt there were some things which a Government must do, not because the Government would do them well, but because nobody else would do them at all. What was there in the experience which they had had of the Government during the last few years to encourage them to countenance such a great extension of the administrative functions of any British Government. Was the information on which they had acted always so very accurate? The hon. and learned Member who sat opposite told the House of the mistakes made in the conduct of the late war, and he spoke of the complaints made by various Cabinet Ministers of the information supplied to them by their expert advisers. Only a year ago he himself heard the Prime Minister assure the House with the utmost confidence that on the authority of his legal advisers there was no possibility of successfully conducting a prosecution against Mr. Whitaker Wright. If such astounding errors, made no doubt in perfect good faith, could creepin to the administration of a Government in regard to matters so entirely within its own province as war and justice, how absurd it was to invite them to embark upon this immense extension of their functions into the far more complicated and unmeasured difficulties of commerce and of speculation. When a tariff or treaty had been adopted and some costly error had been discovered in it, the Prime Minister would say the Government had trusted to their commercial advisers, and that, if there had been any error, it was not the fault of the Government or their advisers, but of some defect in the state of the economic law. The Member for West Birmingham would add that the tariff would have worked perfectly well if it had not been for the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition and the traitorous intrigues of the foreign members of the Cobden Club. There was such a thing as pressure. Some time ago the Prime Minister said it would not be proper to put Members of the House on a Commission to inquire into trade-union law, because of the pressure to which they would be subjected. He remembered the late Postmaster - General stating that nothing would be more improper than to put an hon. Member of the House on a Committee to rearrange and consider the wages of the Post Office servants because of the pressure that organisation could put upon Members of Parliament.

There were three perfectly distinct kinds of pressure which could be exerted upon a protectionist Government. First, there was corruption, direct and indirect. Then there was the pressure on individual Members who would not get returned unless they were willing to go in on the basis of obtaining as great trade concessions for their own constituencies as they possibly could. Everybody looked at the tariff from his own point of view. A truly scientific tariff was one a man was able to arrange for himself in the interests of the Empire and the working classes. That was why the hon. Member for Rochester felt sure that no tariff would be complete which did not include a stiff duty on imported cement, and why the Conservative candidate in St. Albans felt that no tariff would be really scientific which did not provide for the free admission of straw plaits. Then there was the third class of pressure—the pressure of organised interests upon political leaders. He expected that if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham were present he would have admitted that he had already learned something about that kind of pressure from his experience in forming his Tariff Commission. A genteel instance of the pressure was seen in the fact that a year ago the ex-Colonial Secretary would not have paid much attention to the opinion of the right hon. Member for Sleaford, but today he had to shelter himself behind the right hon. Gentleman, because he was believed to be the representative of the great landed interest without whose support no scheme of protection had the slightest chance of passing. There was nothing to justify the assumption by the Government of new burdens which experience had shown them to be little competent to bear, and which their successors would unhesitatingly refuse.

Mr. Winston Churchill.

The Secretary to the Board of Trade referred to the argument with which Members had been made familiar in The Times, and which had been frequently put forward by that able young gentleman who spent his afternoons in writing letters over the signature "Tariff Reformer," and his evenings in writing leading articles saying how excellent and conclusive those letters were. He was surprised that his hon. friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade in his speech had not distinguished between two perfectly distinct kinds of dumping which were hardly ever present in combination. There were two distinct causes which led to the sale of goods in this country at prices unremunerative to the producer. One was the deliberate attempt of one set of traders to smash and ruin another set of traders and to capture their business. Free-traders and protectionists alike would condemn that form of commercial piracy. But it was not only practised by foreigners against Englishmen, it was practised by German against German, Frenchman against Frenchman, and, above all, by American aganst American. [OPPOSITION cries of "Birmingham."] He did not say that they had any occasion to make allusion to old and he believed libellous statements. If a gigantic conspiracy could be proved on the part of a foreign country against any of our principal industries, and it could be shown that the intervention of the Government would save that industry, while its abstention would allow it to be destroyed, what Government would refuse to propose, and what House of Commons would refuse to pass legislation to deal with the matter? He asked hon. Members not to imagine that a free-trade Government would not be able to deal with great trusts. Why! that was the only Government that could deal with them. President Roosevelt, the powerful head of the American Executive, had been practically powerless in dealing with the great combinations which supported the Republican Party. A free-trade Government caring nothing for great trusts would be able to intervene with crushing effect were it proved that they were injurious to the general interests of the people.

The greater part of the dumping in this country did not arise from the cause just stated, but from the desire of foreign countries to preserve their own market, to be able to charge their people what they liked, and to get rid of any over production. The system of protection which prevailed in Germany stimulated production at the expense of consumption. The protectionist fallacy was to imagine that production was the only thing that mattered. Prosperity depended upon not only the volume of production, but also the harmonious relation between production and the consuming power. He did not deny that dumping was an uneconomic operation, that artificial prices whether high or low were uneconomic and operated in restraint of trade. But the question must be considered as a whole. It was necessary to look, not only at the effects of dumping here, but also at the conditions which gave rise to it. The House was entitled to ask the Government what was their plan for dealing with dumping. It was all very well to talk about being anxious to shut out unfair competition, but how were they going to discriminate between the two? It was obvious that "dumped" steel was the cheapest of steel, and any tariff framed to shut out that must à fortiori shut out all articles produced at a higher price. He did not deny there was a dislocation caused by dumping, but the contention of the free-traders was that, on the whole, the assailant was nearly always more injured than the victim, that in nearly every case we were able to make a profit out of the transaction, that the conditions which gave rise to dumping were unhealthy and wasteful, that although they might result in profit to the manufacturers who were lucky enough to "rig the market" they were a gross injustice to the mass of the population, that they were the direct result of protective tariffs, and that the only remedy they could apply, if indeed there was any remedy, would be to establish in our own country those evil conditions which we discover abroad. They heard something last session about "jam and pickles." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had asked, both in the House and on the platform, how many people who had been turned out of the sugar refineries had found employment in stirring up jam pots and filling bottles of pickles. Well, the figures had been ascertained. In 1891 there were 5,700 persons employed in sugar refineries, and ten years later that number was reduced to 2,400, showing a loss of 3,300. The despised trades of jam and pickles, which employed in 1891 30,000 persons, in 1901 employed 41,000 persons, thus accommodating 6,700 more persons than were displaced by any injury that our sugar refineries had suffered from dumping. The French had a proverb, "Drive away nature and it returns at a gallop." So it was with the high tariffs of foreign countries. Although here and there they were able to create trade, they deprived the people of the opportunity of moving forward into those high-grade employments where labour was more varied and more generously rewarded, and leadership in which was the greatest mark of industrial strength in the present condition of the world.

Now, his hon. friend preached one thing in this House, and quite another doctrine outside. They had been called upon not merely to make a mere modification of free trade. It was a complete repudiation which they had been asked to make. He would read what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade said when he addressed a meeting in the country. The hon. Gentleman had got up a more refined and up-to-date version for the House of Commons; but he painted with rather a bolder touch in the constituencies. His hon. friend said that there were £150,000,000 worth of manufactured goods imported into the country, which represented a loss in wages of between £70,000,000 and £80,000,000, and he thought that a large part of that sum might, by a stroke of the pen, be secured to the British workmen without any loss to the country. Now, that was a startling development of the free-trade theory. Was that the opinion of the Board of Trade; was that fairly supported by the great Department of which he was one of the chiefs; was it the view of the President of the Board of Trade? Was the right hon. Gentleman of opinion that if you shut out half the imports into this country we should make all these things in this country in addition to all those we already made?

MR. BONAR LAW said he did not argue that that result would be obtained by shutting out foreign goods, but that we should secure a fair share of the foreign makets.

MR. WINSTON CHURCHILL said he had quoted the words of the hon. Gentleman, and they seemed to favour the impression that by shutting out the greater part of our imports they would produce greater employment. He was grateful to the hon. Gentleman for correcting him in so friendly a manner, because he was afraid that the hon. Gentleman might apply to him the vitriolic scorn he had used on the unfortunate lawyers who sat beside him on the Treasury Bench. In supporting the doctrines which had been quoted, the hon. Gentleman might be guilty of a fallacy but not of any fraud. But those who regarded that doctrine, in the words of the Duke of Devonshire, as an inversion of fact—if they were to make themselves responsible for supporting its enunciation in any direct manner, would be guilty of a deliberate propagation of error. The importance of this great debate, although it had been robbed of its animation through the absence of the great leaders of the fiscal controversy, extended beyond the limits of our domestic affairs, and even beyond the limits of the British Empire. All the world was concerned in the decision they were going to take. Protectionists and free-traders, rival schools in every country in the world, were watching with the closest attention the discussions in that House. They were waiting with the keenest anxiety the result of the appeal which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had lodged against the decision of 1846. There were very powerful free-trade movements in Germany, America, and Australia. [AN HON. MEMBER on the GOVERNMENT Benches: No.] Did not the hon. Gentleman know that the Democratic Party in the United States, which was expected to return to power at some time, was pledged to substantial reductions of the tariff? And that the Democratic platform was largely free-trade. His hon. Friend said, "No"; but the House knew perfectly well whether he was right or not. He thought there was a great deal more reason to hope for a reduction of tariffs from free-trade discussions in these foreign countries than from any facilities for commercial diplomacy which the Government were understood to offer. At all events there was something inspiring in the idea of all these millions of German and American free-traders moving forward, in spite of every difficulty and obstacle which ignorance and prejudice could interpose, towards the beacon light we had long upheld. He believed that that movement was fraught with immense consequences to the permanent interests of mankind, and if, at this juncture in the history of free trade, the British people, in spite of the impassioned appeal made to them, and of the popularity of the right hon. Gentleman who made that appeal, in spite of the wealth and influence which supported it—if they found that the British people solemnly affirmed, after sixty years of fighting hostile tariffs with free imports, that the policy of free trade was sound and unimpeachable, that could not fail to be of great advantage to the free-trade cause in these foreign countries. Indeed some of them might live long enough to see the fulfilment of those venturesome predictions of Mr. Cobden. He thought that in the face of the momentous issues which had been thrust upon them the ordinary considerations of which Party should sit on which side of the House, and what Members would be returned to serve in Parliament, seemed small and unworthy. When so much was uncertain, when so much was obscure, and when everything was shifting and manœuvring around them, they must get on to firm ground; and he, for one, would proudly join in the assertion of those great principles of social justice and of economic truth which were embodied in the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Montrose.

*MR. WHITE RIDLEY (Stalybridge) said that the course of the debate had shown two substantial issues presented to the House. The first was as between free trade and protection, and the second was an attempt on the part of nearly every speaker to go beyond and behind the policy which the Prime Minister had initiated. He could not conceive why this should be, except for individual purposes. As he understood it, the policy of the Prime Minister at Sheffield was precisely the same as the policy of the Government at the present moment—viz., the policy of retaliation. Under these circumstances he could not imagine why the tariff-leaguers and the free-fooders should not go into the same lobby at the end of this debate on the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, and in support of the Government, except for the reason that whereas the majority of the members of the Free Food League distrusted and did not confide in the general policy of the Government, those who supported the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham did trust and confide in the general policy of the Government. He could not see why the members of the Free Food League should taunt the Prime Minister, as the hon. Member for Oldham had done, with having changed the policy of the Party. He had yet to learn that free trade, or what was called free trade, was ever the definite and distinct policy of the Unionist Party. If the records were examined it would be found that very many members of the Unionist or Conservative Party had held strongly that fair trade, as opposed to free trade, was the best thing for the country. That had been an open question for many years, and he had yet to learn that to hold that opinion was inconsistent with loyalty to the Party. It would be remembered that the policy embodied in the death duties had been bitterly attacked by the Party to which he had the honour to belong; but would anyone say that that was the policy of the Conservative Party, because they had not been able to reverse it? In the same way would anyone say that because the Conservative Party had never been able to reverse the policy of free imports that that was the policy of the Unionist Party?

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol had said that the policy of the Government was entirely incompatible with the further policy of preference; but there was no incompatibility between the two policies. The same principle underlay them both. The policy of retaliation, he ventured to think, had for its basis the extension of our area of trade in foreign countries; the policy of preferential tariffs had for its basis the extension of our area of trade in the Colonies. From the point of view he approached the question he did not say that those two policies were incompatible. The policy of retaliation had as its basis the extension of our area of trade in foreign countries and the Birmingham policy had for its object the extension of our area of trade in the Colonies. He admitted there were difficulties to be overcome in both policies in the arrangements of the tariffs and the negotiations with the Colonies, and probably nobody would be entirely satisfied, but because they could not satisfy nobody were they to satisfy nobody, and because they could not have everything they wanted were they going to refuse to take a single step in the direction they desired to go? Were they to consider the question closed because of those difficulties? While this country had been adhering to the present system the other countries had been marching on different lines and had developed their area of trade. The United States and Germany and South Africa had taken real genuine steps in the direction of extending their trade area. Was it not true that England, the greatest trading Empire of the world, had taken no practical steps to really extend her free-trade area. Almost any Member of the House would say if they could get free trade with the Colonies and develop it on the exact lines adopted in the United States, they would support entirely the Birmingham policy. But because they could not get free trade at once were they not going to take a single step? If they would not move in the direction of preference how were they going to get any nearer free trade with the Colonies. The policy they had been pursuing for the last twenty years would not allow free trade even with the Colonies. The argument for continuing the present system was that it had been based upon the moral attitude, but he could not see that free trade was more moral than protection. That argument rested on the theory that it was wrong as well as impolitic to impose any hindrance upon trade. The whole policy of the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for West Birmingham was to impose taxes in order to remove those hindrances. They might differ as to the way in which they were going to remove those hindrances, but the whole design of tariff reform was to remove and not to impose hindrances. If that idea failed he should not be able to support the Birmingham scheme with the enthusiasm which he now did.

They had been frequently told that those engaged in the cotton trade of Lancashire were opposed to a reversal of the present system. They had been told that whatever industries might benefit from the ex-Colonial Secretary's scheme the cotton industry of Lancashire could not benefit. The Board of Trade returns showed last year a state of things supposed to fill free-importers with pleasure, but when they went closely into the matter they would find that the increased export of manufactured cotton goods represented a decrease in the amount because they were of a higher value, the cost of material having considerably increased on account of the price of cotton in America. Whilst the Board of Trade returns gave this increased value in cotton exports and imports everybody knew that in Lancashire trade depression had become very serious indeed. The House would see, therefore, that the Board of Trade returns were by no means a certain index of the increased prosperity of the country. What was the reason of this ? Was it not because the supply of cotton came almost exclusively from one quarter of the world? What would have been the case if they had adopted a wise colonial policy and developed the growth of cotton in the Colonies. He was aware that it would be impossible to place a tax of any sort or shape on raw cotton. There was an institution called the British Cotton Growing Association on which Members from both sides of the House acted with a common aim, and they were urging the Government to construct railways in East Africa in order to develop the growth of cotton. Free-traders who supported this Association must realise that, by asking for this money for railways, they were asking for a bounty and departing far from the pure milk of the Cobdenite theory. Upon this quesion what he wished to emphasise was that if the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had been put into force years ago the present difficulties in the cotton trade might have been mitigated and there would not have been such a very serious crisis in Lancashire. It was said that the Birmingham policy would cause a rise in the cost of production and that that would be a serious blow to the cotton trade. Had there not now been a great rise in the cost of production ? It was said that they were going to cause the United States of America to put an export duty on cotton, but he would remind the House that the Constitution of the United States would not allow such a duty to be imposed. Of course they could alter the law, but it would have to be done by a two-thirds majority of each State in the Union, and did anyone imagine that those States which grew the cotton were going to vote for an export duty on cotton which would prevent them selling. Was it not more likely that under our present system of allowing unrestricted development abroad efforts would be made to keep their cotton at home and make it into manufactured goods themselves. In recent years the development of manufactured cotton goods in the United States had been out of all proportion to the development of cotton manufacture in England.

They were told that they ought to devote their attention to remedying the social condition of the people, that they ought to pay more attention to education and encourage the enterprise of their manufacturers. Were they to encourage social reforms like the housing of the working classes and local option, and at the same time to neglect the most important of all social reforms which would solve at once the difficulties of the housing and the drink questions, namely, the problem of finding regular employment for the workers. Were they to develop the education of this country in order that men, when educated, would have to go abroad to foreign mills because they could not find a market for their education at home. Free trade had developed in England a race of manufacturers who were not so enterprising, according to the free-traders, as the manufacturers of protectionist Germany. Yet free-traders were constantly saying that free trade developed enterprise and protection discouraged it. He ventured to say that the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham struck at the root of all these things. Some hon. Members thought the Government ought to at once appeal to the country, but in his opinion the Government held a higher trust. He would work whole-heartedly for the policy of preferential tariffs, but he would work for it within the Party; and his reply to the taunt that the Government ought to seek the verdict of the country on fiscal reform was that the Government had committed to their care and defence interests of almost equal importance to the questions of retaliation or preferential tariffs.

And, it being half-past Seven of the Clock, the debate stood adjourned till this Evening's Sitting.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], " That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth :—

" Most Gracious Sovereign,—

" We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament. "—(Mr. Hardy.)

" At the end of the Question, to add the words, ' But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, " That those words be there added."

*SIR WILLIAM HOLLAND (Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham) said it would be recognised in all quarters of the House that the introduction of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Montrose had been amply justified by the speeches, or many of them, that had been delivered in this debate. He was particularly grateful to the President of the Board of Trade for the speech he had delivered on a previous evening in favour of free trade, as a good many hon. Members had been very doubtful as to what his attitude was in regard to this policy. As he understood the hon. Member for Stalybridge, he advocated the policy of the right hon. Member for Birmingham on the score of the benefit that would be likely to accrue to the cotton trade, a trade in which his constituents were chiefly interested. He himself had always held the opinion that no trade was likely to lose more by any tinkering with tariffs than that particular trade, for the reason that there was no trade in this country to-day that depended more on foreign markets. Eighty per cent of our production was sent abroad, nearly two-thirds of which went to foreign countries. Therefore it would be at once seen how much our cotton trade stood to lose by a policy which might have the effect of interfering with the trade in foreign markets and which might close to us some of the neutral markets of the world. With regard to the trifling imports referred to by the hon. Member, when we considered that £70,000,000 or £80,000,000 was sent out of this country every year in cotton goods and cotton yarns it would be seen that the cotton trade could afford to regard with comparative composure any slight increase in its imports. He held in his hand a resolution passed by a representative meeting of the trade, which was in the following terms—

> "That the great cotton industry of the United Kingdom owes its pre-eminence to, and can only be maintained by, the policy of free trade."

He attached great importance to that resolution, because he knew the character and ability of the men who took part in the discussion of the resolution. A large association with which he happened to be connected had many thousands of workpeople engaged in producing yarns for the German market, and if we became involved in a tariff war with Germany would the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, or anybody else, guarantee those thousands of workpeople the continuous employment they now enjoyed? It would be poor consolation to those workpeople to be told that although their trade was damaged other trades would benefit or that we could not establish new factories without closing old ones.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge had said, "Because we cannot satisfy everybody are we not to try and satisfy anybody?" but the great danger was lest there should be more people dissatisfied after such legislation than there were before. He believed that more harm than good would be done by legislation of this kind, and that the great masses of the people would be in a worse position after it than they were before. When the census was taken in the United States, census papers were distributed with several columns ruled in them containing questions which had to be answered, and he understood that one of those columns was headed "Condition as to Marriage." When the papers were collected it was found that one man had filled up this column "Hard up before marriage but ten times worse after," and he believed that a good many who were engaged in the industries and commerce of this country would be ten times worse off after this tariff reform had come into operation than they were before. There was no other country in the world where tariff legislation was so risky as it was in this. We had adapted our industries to a free-trade system, and no doubt under that system some of our manufactures had increased abnormally, and had thus become so to speak top-heavy, but that made it all the more important that nothing should be done to jeopardise them because they would be all the more easily upset. The hon. Member had asked whether the cost of production had not been increased owing to the present high price of cotton, but hon. Members would admit that an increase in the cost of production caused by a tariff was an entirely different thing to an increase of the cost of production caused by dear cotton. Dearness of cotton applied equally to all nations, but an increase in the cost of production arising from tariff legislation affected only that country where that tariff legislation was in force. The hon. Member in regretting that preference for the Colonies had not been established years ago, had expressed the opinion that if such had been the case a great deal more cotton would have come from the Colonies, but it was difficult to suppose that that would have been the case unless there had been some discrimination by us against the United States, a discrimination which would be fraught with the greatest danger to this country. It had been alleged that there would be no fear in such a case of an export duty being placed upon raw cotton, because the Constitution of the United States would prevent it. With that he did not quite agree. At present, as he understood the Constitution of the United States, no individual State was allowed to impose an export duty, but Congress was supreme and would have the right to confer that power on any of the States. That disposed of the contention that if we were involved in a tariff war with the United States we should not be in danger of an export duty being placed on her raw cotton.

He cordially approved of the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Stalybridge when he spoke of the desirability of growing more cotton within the limits of our Empire, and he was extremely glad to observe that that important question had been referred to in the Speech from the Throne. The importance of that it was quite impossible to overstate when one considered that the welfare and happiness of hundreds of thousands of people in the cotton manufacturing districts were entirely dependent upon it, and that being so, the Government could undertake no other productive work which could compare with it. It had constantly been argued with perfect truth that our Empire was extremely vulnerable owing to the extent on which we were dependent on foreign nations for food and raw materials. One way in which the Empire could be made less vulnerable than it was now was by growing larger supplies within the Empire. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade had referred to the percentage of unemployed, which, he said, during the last half of last year showed an increase; if the hon. Member took into account the fact that the cotton trade was suffering, even a year ago more or less owing to the cotton famine, then in all fairness he must admit that the increase in the percentage of the unemployed in that trade during the last half of last year was in no way connected with the fiscal question. The same condition of things obtained now. He therefore warned those who were in favour of tariff reform not to quote the cotton trade as an instance of the need of tariff legislation, because the troubles from which the cotton trade suffered were quite apart from any such question, and tariff legislation would tend to aggravate rather than to remove them.

The hon. Gentleman, although it was late in the day to re-open that question, seemed to argue that where a tariff was imposed the foreigner would pay it and not the importer, but it must be obvious to everyone that in the long run the consumer must pay it. What was the testimony of Germany on this point? It was to be found in the remarkable words in the preamble to the new German tariff law.

> "Prices in the home market have, so far as the circumstances prevailing during the last decade permit a judgment, experienced a rise corresponding pretty accurately to the amount of the duty."

The hon. Member the Secretary to the Board of Trade seemed to plume himself on the legislation last year with regard to the Sugar Convention. Did the hon. Member or any of those associated with him contemplate at the time the Sugar Convention was passed all the consequences which had ensued since. That Convention prevented bounty-fed sugar coming to this country from Russia, and what did she do, she immediately cast about for a means of retaliation, and discovered it in Indian tea. Naturally the Indian tea planter would want to know why his product should be penalised upon entering Russia, seeing that India had done nothing to deserve it.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR pointed out that Russia had quite as much reason to complain of the action of India as of our actions on account of the countervailing duties she imposed upon Russian sugar.

*SIR WILLIAM HOLLAND said that the right hon. Gentleman could not deny that Russia's action with regard to Indian tea was the direct result of the Sugar Convention, and, that being so, the Indian tea planter would naturally wish to know why, at this particular juncture, he should be penalised in this way in the interest of the West Indian planter. He asked whether such legislation did not tend rather to promote the disruption of the Empire than its consolidation. When a Government embarked on fiscal legislation generally all sorts of results were apt to occur which were not contemplated at the time when such legislation was initiated. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had in his speech two days previously said he was prepared to fight for free trade. There was a by-election now going on in Mid Hertfordshire in which the Conservative candidate was not a free-trader. Would the right hon. Gentleman fight for free trade in that constituency? If so, he would be compelled to oppose the Conservative candidate, who had described himself as a "whole-hogger," which he presumed to mean that he was prepared to support the policy of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham in its entirety, though on the face of it it looked as if a "whole-hogger" went further, seeing that bacon was excluded from the Birmingham programme. The Conservative candidate in that fight, in a circular which he had issued to the electors, had stated that the British workman's savings were the lowest in Europe. He contended that that was not true. It might be true with regard to that portion of their savings which was deposited in the Savings Banks, but it was not true as to the aggregate savings, and, even if the deposits in the Savings Banks were regarded as the sole test, it would be found that Denmark and Switzerland, two more or less free countries, headed the list, which rather tended to strengthen the free-trade argument. The fact of the Savings Bank deposits of the British workmen being the lowest was easily explained. In the first place the interest allowed to depositors was far lower than in any other country; next, the amount allowed to be deposited was limited, but the great reason of all was that here there were other means offered to the depositors for investing their savings in the great building and friendly societies and in other ways, and it would be seen that he was quite justified in controverting the statement issued in that circular. The savings of the British workmen were, he believed, the highest in Europe instead of being the lowest. He was not afraid of any discussion so far as free trade was concerned provided always that those who gained by that policy would speak out as loudly as those who alleged they were injured by it, but the tendency was rather to cry out when the shoe pinched, and, on the other hand, to keep quiet and certainly not to proclaim from the house-tops the fact that under a particular system people were doing well. Now that the question of fiscal reform had been raised the country would insist upon its being thrashed thoroughly out, therefore he would not disapprove of the appointment of a Royal Commission, upon which every shade of opinion should be represented, to investigate the matter. What were the features of the Board of Trade returns of which the tariff-reformers at present complained? First they complained of the largeness of our imports, but when it was pointed out that 70 or 80 per cent. of those imports were raw materials and foodstuffs, he believed everyone would rather see them increase than diminish. Then they complained of the smallness of the exports of manufactured goods. There was not a nation in the world which could hold a candle to us in that matter. If he found a man objecting to the smallness of our exports to protected countries he quite agreed that it would be most desirable to increase them, but he absolutely denied that the policy now before the country was likely to do so. In his judgment it was dangerous to dogmatise on the figures of the Board of Trade because they related wholly to the external commerce of the country. In his own business, if he found the home trade sufficient to absorb all his production he would not send travellers abroad to push his trade in foreign markets. It was only when the home trade slackened that he would do that, therefore, if these statistics were an unsafe test as to the condition of our trade, it was little short of a crime for the country to be committed to a reversal of its fiscal policy on the strength of them. A far safer test of fiscal policy than imports and exports was, in his opinion, the general condition of the people at large. Were they well fed, were they well clothed, and well housed? Not so well, perhaps, as we should like to see them, but far better than in any protected country in Europe, which were the countries now held up to us for imitation.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): No.

*SIR WILLIAM HOLLAND said he thought it was suggested that we should imitate the fiscal policy of the protected countries of Europe.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: As I interrupted the hon. Member perhaps I ought to explain my interruption. We argue from the model of the United States.

*SIR WILLIAM HOLLAND said he was of course referring to European countries, the United States being in a category of its own. Measured by the standard he had referred to, our fiscal policy had not been a failure; on the contrary, it had been a great success, but protection would lead to monopoly, and in proportion as they had monopoly they had an unequal distribution of wealth and consequent discontent and dissatisfaction.

It put him in mind of a verse he read in an American paper—

"A millionaire I'd like to be Alack 'tis scarcely fair,
Another gets the million
And I only get the 'aire.'"

There would be an increase in the cost of living and of production, and any such increase would paralyse competition in the great neutral markets of the world. If they had protection they would run the risk of losing most-favoured-nation treatment. Other countries had tried the policy of retaliation and the result had been that more frequently tariffs had been raised instead of being lowered. One great advantage of our present system was that it attracted the buyers of the world to our markets, and anyone who had anything to sell knew that it was an advantage to be able to gain the ear of buyers. A vague mandate for retaliation would be like giving the Government a blank cheque. Of that they had had experience which had not been very satisfactory. It was clear that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had unduly magnified colonial interests, minimised the interests of this country, and ignored altogether those of India. The Colonies, so far as he had observed, wished for nothing more than even-handed justice, which they would regard as essential to the permanent maintenance of a strong Empire. He had attended the Imperial Congress of Chambers of Commerce in Canada, and he gathered that the Canadians generally would repel any system of preference which would have the effect of injuring the interests of the mother country, which injury would speedily react upon them. The Colonies stood by the mother country in her distress, and in face of such splendid loyalty every preference which the wit of man could devise seemed unworthy of consideration, inasmuch as it sought to put the existence of the Empire on a cash basis. A fiscal union would involve conflicting and contradictory aims and therefore would not consolidate the Empire. To persist in it would lead to friction, strife, and jealousy. Fiscal reform did not offer the best solution of the difficulty. The best solution would be found in a political union—the formation of a consultative, rather than a legislative body, and of this even the Prime Minister did not disapprove. That would be a thousand times more hopeful a solution of the problem how best to draw the Colonies more closely to the mother country.

SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER said he had always held that the American case could not be advantageously used for purposes of comparison in this controversy. The American Continent was in itself the greatest free-trade continent in the world. Forty-eight States, which were formerly under a system of protection, had now formed themselves into a free-trade continent, possessing a mineral and natural wealth which put it quite beyond any analogy in our own country. The general social condition of America was good, there was a perpetual stream of emigration into the country from protected countries, still apprehension was being created in the minds of thinking people in America because of the intolerable tariffs which had been brought about by the multi-millionaires. He was of opinion that the discussion had fully justified the Amendment, couched as it was in reasonable and comprehensive terms. It had given an opportunity to all free-traders, wherever they might sit, to combine together to give expression to their emphatic condemnation of the protectionist proposals of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, proposals which had been put forward with the greatest assiduity during last autumn, and especially those which related to taxation on food, though for his part he thought it operated with equal force with regard to the proposed taxes on manufactured goods. What was the second object of the Amendment? He took it to be to get an answer from the Government, with regard to which those who were responsible in the Government had spoken with more than one voice in their replies. The object was to get, if possible, from the Government a clear and unmistakable declaration of policy with regard to the fiscal question, for on the distinctness and clearness of that pronouncement might depend not merely some scores of votes in that House, but in the country, he thought, hundreds of thousands of votes. On its directness also depended, in his opinion, the integrity and future ascendancy of the Party now led by the Prime Minister.

What he wanted to ask the House was this: Could any free-trader feel any assurance from the reply given by the President of the Board of Trade? It certainly had differed from the pronouncements of other members of the Government. What, then, was the impression left on their minds by it? There was no doubt at all that protection was distinct and absolutely different from retaliation. The objects of protection were to exclude foreign imports with the supposed idea of fostering home industries. He did not propose now to go into the merits of that question. With regard to retaliation, the proposal of the Government was to temporarily restrict the import of certain articles from certain countries which were behaving most hostilely towards us in the matter of tariffs. Now, whatever might be said as to the merits of the principle of retaliation, the object was to increase the area of trade and to enlarge our markets. They had been told that Parliament was to have a decisive voice in regard to any retaliatory proposals that might be made by the Executive Government in the future, and that was very important, for, if retaliation was to be of any value to this country, it should be made as difficult as possible for the Executive Government to carry it out. If it was first necessary in each case to get the sanction of Parliament, they would not find such proposals very frequently made. Our chief aggressors with regard to high tariffs were Russia, Germany, and the United States, and if they examined the imports from those countries they would find that they consisted in a large measure of food or raw material for our industries, and if a tax were put on them as suggested it would be most fatal to the interests of this country. It might be possible, however, to suggest a small tax on goods coming from less important countries in Europe, as for instance Portugal. If we put a duty on port we might influence Portugal to give us the most-favoured-nation treatment, but that surely was not a very heroic measure, and it could not form a plank in the platform of any Government seeking the support of the electors of the country. They were told to distinguish between the two policies, but, having carefully examined the question, he was unable to see how they could distinguish and look upon as separate policies the policy of preference and the policy of protection. Preference must mean a tax on food or raw material, and that was certainly protection. All were in agreement with the objects preference sought to attain. They all desired to draw closer the ties between the component parts of the Empire, but, as had already been shown, it was impossible to devise a scheme of preference satisfactory to all parts of the Empire unless it included food and raw material. It was not a sane or a practicable proposal.

Another argument, which at first sight was attractive, was that by a scheme of preference this Empire might ultimately become a self-contained empire, independent of all other countries in the world, but close examination showed that that was a very Utopian idea, which could not possibly be carried out. It was assumed that the Empire would be sufficiently productive to send us, in all years, the quantity of food we consumed, but it was only necessary to go back a few years to see that a concatenation of circumstances might result in the wheat supplies from all parts of the Empire being absolutely inadequate for the requirements of these islands. In 1897 there was famine in India, drought in Australia, and a failure of the wheat crop in Canada, with the result that from all quarters of the Empire we received only 7,500,000 cwt. of wheat, whereas in 1902, when the adverse circumstances had passed away, the quantity received was 25,000,000 cwt. Owing to our present system of open markets, the price of wheat was not in any way affected in that adverse year, but the adoption of a scheme to debar or discourage the free and rapid introduction of wheat from all parts of the world, would in such a year lead to great fluctuations of price, to the detriment of all classes of the community. It was a curious fact that the scheme would seek to discourage the introduction of produce from those very countries, especially Argentina, in which British capital was most interested. Little had been heard during the debate of an argument which had been used with effect in the country, that the proposed taxation would not fall on the consumer. The facts in the Blue-book supported the obvious truth, that ultimately the purchaser must pay the impost. A comparison of prices in New South Wales under free trade and under the system of protection afforded a notable illustration. In 1899 prices under free trade were—beef, 3d.; cheese, 6d.; mutton, 1½d. per pound; and flour, 10s. 3d. per 100lb.; under the protective tariff the prices were 5d., 8d., 4d., and 28s. The cost of clothing also had increased by 25 to 40 per cent. That was an absolutely conclusive proof that the consumer paid. The more the proposal was examined into, the more it would be seen how weak was the case of the protectionists and how unanswerably strong was the case of the free-trader. It was no answer to say that because other countries were thriving under protection we should do the same. The conditions of this country were totally different from those of any other country. We were absolutely dependent on our markets being open to all the world, whether for raw material or for manufuctured goods. He defied any Commission appointed by the Government to define the difference between raw material and manufactured goods. What was raw material one moment was manufactured material the next, and what was manufactured material for one industry was the raw material of another. The House was in possession of the Prime Minister's opinion on his own policy of retaliation, and, vaguely, of his opinion on the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; they also had the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham on his own proposals, but they had not yet heard his opinion on retaliation. It was true they had his opinions of twenty years ago, when, in the cogent manner of which he was such a master, he put forward unanswerable arguments against such a policy, but nothing could be more interesting than to have his present opinions on the subject.

But it was not so much with the merits of the case they had to deal; they spoke for themselves; it was with the methods by which this controversy was being carried on. The country had a right to demand that the issue should be made clear and intelligible. Did the Government commit themselves really and truly to protection, or did they not? The President of the Board of Trade said a majority in the elections would not entitle the present Government to adopt preference or protection; but what would the right hon. Member for Birmingham say to that? In the absence of the Prime Minister—which they all deplored —they could gather his views on the subject only from his pamphlet, his speeches, and his letters, and, so far as he could judge, the whole balance of the Prime Minister's inclination tended towards protection. But what about his colleagues? Earlier in the debate he had had a slight altercation with a member of the Cabinet. As the House was aware, the President of the Local Government Board, a fortnight ago, went down to Wiltshire and made a speech against him and on behalf of a candidate in the Government's cause. He did not desire to quarrel with the right hon. Gentleman on that account. No doubt he was actuated by sincere convictions; but whether that action was the result of the best judgment he would leave the right hon. Gentleman to decide. On that occasion, the fiscal case evidently not being strong enough, the right hon. Gentleman raked up other delinquencies to justify the course he was taking, but he was rather unfortunate in the two matters he selected—the Army and education. As to the former, however instrumental its critics might have been in bringing it about, the fact remained that the whole scheme of the Army had been radically changed since last year, and if the present scheme had been then before the House he would not have felt bound to associate himself with any attack upon it. With regard to education, it was unnecessary to say anything, as he had already given his reasons for the course he took. The London Education Bill undoubtedly underwent a great transformation in the House, and emerged a much better measure than it entered. But it was on public grounds he complained of the action of the right hon. Gentleman. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say he acted, not as a Cabinet Minister, but as an elector.

A gentleman of his prominence could not divest himself of his official position. The right hon. Gentleman had said that protection was a scientific method of taxation in order to obtain revenue. It seemed to him, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman was sailing in his own boat, because taxation for revenue formed no part of the proposals of the Prime Minister nor of those of the Member for West Birmingham. He believed that the Government's policy of retaliation was the stepping-stone to the wider scheme of the Member for West Birmingham. If that were so, why was the right hon. Gentleman still a member of the Government? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham frankly and fairly left the Government when he took up the cudgels for protection, and it appeared to him that many other Members at present on the Treasury Bench ought to have done likewise. He was drawn to only one conclusion—and it had been strengenthed considerably by the speeches in that debate—that the Government were really protectionists, but had not the courage to say so. He should continue to hold that opinion unless the Government would act up to the pledges given by the President of the Board of Trade. But something more was required. Free-traders should ask for the removal of all protectionists from the Government and of all doubtful free-traders. Orders should also be given and carried out for the immediate withdrawal of all Tariff Reform League branches in the constituencies, and for all Conservative associations to abandon the policy of protection. More than half had adopted the full blown policy; he said that these conditions were the irreducible minimum of any free-trader who was worthy of the name. Whatever might take place in the division at the end of this discussion was quite immaterial, for he was convinced that the country was sick and tired of this ambiguity and shuffling. The electors would insist upon a definite and clear issue, and only those who took up a definite position one way or the other would be Members of the next Parliament.

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said it would have been infinitely better if this subject could have been discussed apart from Party feeling, which was likely to take them away from the real question of what was the best position to take up for the welfare of the country in regard to their fiscal arrangements. He was brought up a free-trader, and he always had an inclination to the opinion that free trade had done a great deal for this country. Under what was called free trade, there was no doubt that the country had developed enormously, but from the discussion that had already taken place, one could not help noticing that many other circumstances had been at work. Even the mover of the Amendment admitted that everything was not as he should desire it in regard to the fiscal policy and commercial relations of this country with other parts of the world. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose acknowledged that there were questions, positions, and circumstances which they could not consider satisfactory, and which, as a great commercial nation, they would all gladly see changed and put in a way that would commend itself to their better judgment, and which would be to the interests of the community. They talked very glibly of free trade and protection. He did not see why those terms should be matters of reproach, because all sections of the House had only one desire, and that was the promotion of the well-being of the country. They must acknowledge that they had never yet had free trade, although they had had free imports. A good deal of difficulty had arisen because they described these things in vague terms without absolutely defining their real meaning. It might be argued that free imports were a good thing for a country, but they could not say that free imports could in any sense be called, or at any rate in the Cobden sense, free trade. Cobden's idea was a totally different thing to free imports, and his whole idea was that free trade would lead different nations of the world to produce those things which they could produce to the best advantage. Nobody argued that they had got anything approaching that state of things now. He had recently visited most of the chief cities in America, and when he went to the great stores there, he was told that they had no English goods, and could not sell them.

Of course, as an Englishman, he resented that, and he could not understand how there could be free trade when English goods were excluded. They all agreed that it was outrageously unfair that these tariff walls should be raised so that they could not get British goods into those countries.

MAJOR SEELY (Isle of Wight): We are treated no worse than any other country.

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY said that two blacks did not make a white. The object of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was that something should be done to put a stop to this outrageously unfair state of things. Lord Avebury had stated that if there was an outrageous case of unfairness all they had got to do was to bring it to the notice of the House, and the Government of the day should bring in a Bill to put a stop to it. He had been a Member of the House for twenty years, and session after session they had tried to do something in connection with the sugar bounties, and it had taken twenty years to do anything. The object of the Sugar Convention Bill was to do away with the gross unfairness of competition in the sugar trade, and that object had now been accomplished. He knew the difficulties of retaliation, but he could not believe that it was beyond the power of this country to retaliate. It was reasonable and fair, he thought, that somehow or another the Government of the day should be invested—he did not suggest with a free hand, but with the power of retaliation. He saw no difficulty in that. The simple fact that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had brought this question up had already produced an effect in Germany in regard to their threats towards Canada and Australia, and if simple discussion of the question produced that effect, surely it would be possible to give the Government some power of retaliation by which they would be able to break down some of the tariff barriers that now existed.

Having had a great deal to do with the working classes and the poor, there were two points he wished especially to put forward. First of all there should be ample employment for the people, and secondly cheap food for the people. Those two things were essential, and, in his opinion, of the two plentiful employment was of more importance than cheap food. Some people were afraid of food being taxed, but he would remind them that they had not got free food at the present time, and they never had had it. Even the free-fooders did not suggest that they should have free food, for they had got taxed food at the present time. They taxed tea, which was almost a necessity, and sugar, and there was another item which was almost food to the very poorest which was taxed, and that was tobacco. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, oh!"] He knew something of the extreme poor, and he knew that many of them would sooner be deprived of some of their food than their tobacco. He did not think it was a good thing to announce to other nations that whatever happened England would never tax food. He thought if America was absolutely convinced that this country was in earnest they would be prepared to bargain and reduce their tariffs. In the United States they laughed and smiled when we talked to them about our tariff system. If the United States were convinced that we were in earnest, and determined to have a war of tariffs and retaliation for such time as was necessary, he believed that they would give way to a very great extent. He did not wish to see tariffs increased indefinitely, but he was in favour of putting them on until they secured fairer trade for this country. If America would give way, he was sure that Canada, and Germany, and other countries would also give way. With regard to the importation of goods, there was no doubt that the great increase in the importation of goods, which used to be made in this country, was a serious question, and a very disquieting fact. [AN HON. MEMBER: Why?] He knew something of the poorer districts of London, and he considered this state of things disquieting, because he knew that the poor people could do this work, and were willing to do it, and yet those articles were imported ready-made, free of duty, from abroad. This House was always passing legislation to make the manufacture of goods more costly, and he did not object to such legislation. The Factory Acts and the Sanitary Laws were passed to secure the well-being of the workers, and they were quite right, and proper, and humane; but it was an extraordinary anomaly that, while in this country they increased the difficulties of production in this way, they did not mind goods being produced abroad under conditions which were not allowed in this country.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): Can the hon. Member mention a country where the laws for industrial production are worse than in this country?

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY said that he could mention every country in Europe. While they had laid these restrictions upon the manufacturers of this country, they had allowed foreign goods to be imported to compete with them, which had been made without those conditions, and thus foreigners were permitted to undermine, undercut, and undersell British manufacturers. It might be argued that the importation of foreign goods was due to several causes, and he was not going to say that the sole reason why those goods came in was on account of our fiscal system. But their fiscal system was at any rate one of the reasons, although there might be other reasons as well. It might be true that there was want of enterprise amongst British manufacturers, and it might also be said that trades-union rules had had some effect; some might argue with proof that the people of this country wasted a good deal of their resources upon alcohol; but these after all were only items, and one item certainly was the fiscal system. Was it not reasonable that before a man employed capital in an enterprise in which he would have to pay wages, and add to the wealth and prosperity of the country, that he should be protected from being undersold by the "dumping" system which was allowed at present? There was no doubt that this uncertainty of an enterprise being remunerative, and the possibility that a man, after investing large sums of money in machinery and business, might be hampered or injured by foreign competition of an unfair character, tended to retard enterprise and decrease that employment upon which the welfare of the whole country depended. To meet an evil of this kind he thought exceptional measures ought to be taken, and surely that was not unreasonable. He did not agree that this country was nearly ruined, and many people talked very exaggeratedly upon this subject. Wise merchants did not wait to be ruined before considering their position, but they looked at the signs of the time and regulated their businesses accordingly. He thought the Government ought to do the same. The amount of manufactured cotton goods, hardware, cutlery, building materials, iron and steel, and other articles imported into this country were increasing in amount and had largely increased during the last three or four years, and these were matters which required their very careful consideration.

He did not wish to say anything that he ought not to, but it was a little difficult to understand the exact position in which they stood. But he gathered that the action of the Government was to see why we were getting into the state in which we were getting, and whether anything could be done to stop it. No doubt at the present time the country was not in an extremely bad way. Trade during the last decade had been good, but if there were indications that, owing to the increase in the imports of manufactured goods there might in the future be a want of employment in this country, he thought the Government were right in considering the fiscal question. There was to some people a sort of fetish in the very name free trade, and they would not allow anybody to say a word against it. He was afraid that it was an image only of tinsel and not of solid gold. Whether the Government went as far as the right hon. Member for West Birmingham he did not quite know. He ventured to say, at one time, that they could not by any possible means exempt food from this subject if they were going to resort to retaliation with certain countries. He thought it was not honest to say that they could resort to retaliation unless they had a perfectly free hand. A question allied to this was that of preferential tariffs. He knew the arrangement of preferential tariffs with the Colonies was extremely difficult. When he was in Canada last year he crossed to the Pacific and learned much by the way. He came to the conclusion that Canada was quite able to look after herself. He found there was a kindly and loyal feeling towards us in every way, but he thought they would resent any sort of charitable patronage. He was sure they would resent the infliction of any hardship on the life of the people here in order to promote their welfare. Still he could not help thinking that it was not beyond the wit of man somehow or other to give our colonies as much preferential favour as we could. There were many ways in which we could help the Colonies if we chose to do so. He felt that part and parcel of our fiscal system should be in every possible way to give them what advantage we could. Although he did not wish to hint or throw out the idea that we were going to buy their support and loyalty by that kind of action, he said that we could by our fiscal system do much to promote their wealth, and we should certainly do so. In the territory of Canada there were enormous fields still undeveloped where foodstuffs could be produced for this country, and he had no doubt that with a little encouragement and assistance that territory might be the means of contributing, not only to the wealth of Canada, but to the bettering of the condition of our people here.

The political position here at the present time was somewhat peculiar. The illness of the Prime Minister was most regrettable, because it was not possible to discuss the fiscal question satisfactorily without him. They were handicapped in all directions. He said so with all respect to hon. Gentlemen on the Government Front Bench. Hon. Gentlemen opposed to the Government seemed to think that they were trying to revert to the fiscal system which existed previous to 1846. He could not conceive of the Government ever having such an idea in their heads. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had no such idea. But we had had nearly sixty years experience of the great change which was then made, and, while many benefits had accrued, it had been found that there were also many drawbacks to the present system. He wished they could dissociate themselves from Party feeling, and address themselves to the consideration of the question, whether, having the experience of the past, they could not do something to make things better. The poverty of the people was due to many causes, and want of employment was no doubt one of the great factors in producing it. If we looked into the fiscal system and revised it, we might be able to devise some way of decreasing the amount of unemployment of the people. He would be no party to anything that would tend to harden the lot of the people of this country, but he was in favour of a careful consideration and revision of our fiscal system with the view of causing an improvement of their condition. It was because he wished to see their condition improved that he would oppose the Amendment.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Burghs) said that the speech which had just been delivered showed the advantage of getting this question debated in the House. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had stated that when he asked for English goods in shops in the United States he was told that there were none to be found. According, however, to the Board of Trade returns last year the United States purchased nearly £23,000,000 of British goods. The statement contradicted by this figure was the sort of statement made on hundreds of platforms. It was this kind of random gossip which had been used to buttress the case for protection, and the advantage of a debate in the House of Commons was that such statements could be tested and answered on the spot. Another advantage of the speech just delivered was that it showed that even an exemplary supporter of the Government was in grave doubt about the position of the Government. He said he did not know whether the Government went so far as the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. That was a perfect justification for the debate. He agreed that it was an unfortunate thing the Prime Minister was not present, because, among other reasons, it afforded a certain excuse to the Government for not giving the House really a full statement of what they were going to do. It was not that they did not know; and he did not think they were entitled to shelter behind the fact that the Prime Minister was absent. This was not the policy of the Prime Minister but of the Cabinet. It was the gospel of the Government, and they had got a dozen of them in the House, and they ought to know something of this gospel of retaliation from these twelve apostles. Throughout the recess they had been fighting protectionist arguments put forward under the auspices of Conservative associations, and what was their surprise to find those arguments thrown over the very first day of the session. At first he thought the President of the Board of Trade had stampeded with the guns, but that was not the fact. It simply meant that the fire was too hot for them, and they were seeking cover. After making protectionist speeches in every constituency, the President of the Local Government Board turned round and charged a Member of the House with having said that the Secretary of the Board of Trade had made a protectionist speech. A few months ago that would have been a compliment. The House was entitled to know the real issue upon which they were to fight. It was a llvery well to pretend to be a free-trader in the House and to use protectionist weapons in the constituencies. It was not playing the game straight. In recent by-elections two poor Government cruisers that took refuge in Port Arthur had been allowed by the Government, without a declaration of war, to be torpedoed by the Tariff Reform League, probably because they were not in the inner harbour. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had said he was willing to give every latitude to hon. Members on his side of the House; but the latitude was in one direction—that was, in the direction of preferential tariff, though the policy of the Government was free trade. There was no latitude in the other direction. It was Long-itude. He appealed to the Government to put an end to this ping-pong playing with the trade of the country.

The President of the Board of Trade was a free-trader on Monday; he was apparently a preferential tariff man on Tuesday. He had been shaking his head ever since. Ministers were as variable as the weather. The only thing they were clear about was dumping. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was allowed to make a speech in the country in favour of preferential tariffs. There ought to be an end to this. It was not fair in any Government. The sudden change in the last two days proved distinctly that the policy had arisen from no national emergency. It was purely due to political emergency; so it changed with political vicissitudes. In 1895 trade was really bad, and armies of the unemployed were parading the streets, but never a word then, and up to the general election, did they hear about the preferential tariff. The moment the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham came back from South Africa he made his speech. Beginning with the by-elections, which showed what he was thinking about, he referred to what he called smaller controversies. He had nothing particular to say about education, and there was loud laughter when he spoke about temperance reform, but when he mentioned local finance, that meaning rates, there was no laughter. The right hon. Gentleman said that education and sobriety were not an atmosphere favourable to the appreciation of the merits of the Conservative Government, and therefore he began to think Imperially. That was where he started. Trade was excellent. Why, only a year before Ministers went about the country saying that we never had had such trade, all of them suggested that that was due to the blessing of having the country governed by themselves and their colleagues. At any rate trade was flourishing, it was splendid, but in a single night it withered like Jonah's gourd. One speech did it all! Agriculture ruined, woollen and cotton going, pearl buttons gone! Never had there been such devastation wrought by a single speech in history. And observe, in the revised editions, some of those trades had been restored by a single stroke of the pen to their former prosperity! The right hon. Gentleman went about the country preaching this doctrine of our impending doom, and curiously enough the ruined people were delighted at the prospect of ruin. They celebrated their ruin in a series of banquets. They rejoiced in the destruction of the tinplate industry at Cardiff, and finished up with a grand spread over ruined trade at the Hotel Métropole, where they toasted the downfall of British trade in the finest champagne. The President of the Tariff Commission was present, but his boon companion, the right hon. Member for Sleaford, was absent. They drank that toast in the finest champagne, but surely they ought to have confined their libations to Tintara! However, one should not expect too great sacrifices to be made in the interests of one's country. At any rate they seemed to have had a good time, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer a day or two afterwards said about the tariff-reformers that they were seeing portents in the air. That was the state of things, everything was going well. We were all ruined, and we were delighted at it. Then came the remedy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who went to Glasgow to unfold it. "We are ruined," cried the right hon. Gentleman, "And what is to be done? The first thing you have to do is to double the supply of pigs." The hope of the country lay in increasing the number of its swine. Well, at first this sort of thing did very well, but the commonsense of the country began to see through it. By-election after by-election showed that after all the people were not to be taken in by all this kind of thing. Then came a change. It was discovered that there was no life in this agitation, and everbody knew perfectly well that it would not survive the political activity of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. It was entirely his creation. There might be a little guerrilla fighting upon the hills of Sheffield, or in that neighbourhood, but the thing was killed. There might be a few faithful followers left who, however, like the wild Boers in the late war remained out of sight. That was the reason why downright protectionists, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford, acclaimed the right hon. the Member for West Birmingham as the greatest statesman that ever lived. If he might be permitted to say it, a fisherman was never a good judge of the size or weight of the salmon that he had caught himself. He did not mean to say that trade was exactly what they would like it to be, but, at any rate, it was on the whole good. It had been excellent, although we were now suffering from depression in some quarters.

There had been a good deal of talk about Scotland, and the iron and steel trade there. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Board of Trade had practically based his case on iron and steel rails, but a very strong supporter of the hon. Gentleman in Scotland, a Conservative, had given him a copy of a report on the progress of the iron and steel trade in Scotland, prepared for, and circulated at, the Glasgow Exhibition. In this report it was stated that in 1883 there were seventy-three steel furnaces in operation, with an output of 290,000 tons, whereas in 1901 there were ninety furnaces in operation, with an output of 945,000 tons; that was, the output had almost quadrupled, notwithstanding trade depression and fluctuations. There had been a steady increase for twenty years. In spite of the competition, especially of our dear cousins across the sea, Scotland was likely to maintain its position, and they were perfectly prepared to fight competition from whatever quarter it came, and to rely on Scotch energy, skill, and enterprise. Protection was really the creed, if he might use the word, of the "funkers." What was the suggestion to meet the difficulty? There was no doubt that dumping was a good, or a bad thing, as they might take it. But if it was a bad thing what was to be done? Retaliation was really a much more dangerous policy than protection, and for this reason. Retaliation was simply an act of war against one particular Power, not for the protection of the whole of your own industries. Take the case of America and the Welsh tinplate trade. We used to sell between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 worth of tinplates a year to the United States. No doubt that trade had practically disappeared as the result of the hostile tariff set up by America to exclude it from the United States. He was putting the case as strongly as he possibly could. But what happened? Wales was still selling £900,000 worth of tinplates every year to America, while America was not selling sixpenny-worth of her tinplates here. [An HON. MEMBER on the GOVERNMENT Benches: They will soon.] That showed how much the hon. Member knew about the matter. The Americans could not sell tinplates within 6s. or 7s. a box, of what the Welsh makers could do, simply because these had got their raw materials much cheaper. Suppose we acted on the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who said—

> "If you had something else you could threaten America with then she would not impose these duties."

But, could America do nothing in return? At the present moment we are carrying 59 per cent. of American trade in our ships; we are selling her £900,000 of tin-plates, and she is selling none in return. If you threaten America you must carry out your threat. America is not a country to be threatened. America is a very rich and determined country, and it would suit certain interests in America to have a tariff war with England. It might suit the shipping interests and the tin-plate interests there. The very first thing that America would do would be to give a bounty to American shipping, which would at once reduce our carrying trade with America. At present, America could not get her coal into the Mediterranean, because she could not get a return cargo. If the return freight were paid, as France was doing by bounties to her shipping, America could send her coal to the Mediterranean on better terms than we could. The policy of retaliation would hit our shipping, it would hit the colliers in South Wales, it would hit the consumers throughout the country, by putting up the price of food, and it would lose the £900,000 of tin-plates—the industry that it was intended to benefit. The same thing applied to Germany. Germany did not charge more for our goods, as a matter of fact, than Canada did. Germany did not exclude us from the coasting trade. It might suit Germany to do that in order to increase her own shipping. She wanted men for her own Navy, but at the present moment she was subsidising our Navy by allowing our ships to carry her goods along her own coasts.

Then we were told that we were going to get colonial preferences. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

> "Why should you slam the door in the face of Canada and the Colonies."

Who was slamming the doors? The Colonies sent their goods to our markets free. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was speaking in Lancashire. Did he know that the Canadian statistics showed that Lancashire goods were charged 200 per cent. in Canada, and that Lancashire took from £10,000,000 to £15,000,000 worth of Canadian goods, on which not a sixpence was charged. It was simply trifling with the constituencies to address such arguments to them. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman who spoke last that Canada did not want any preference. He went to Canada a short time ago and met there a gentleman who originally came from West Birmingham, where he had been an artisan, and knew nothing about farming. He began farming in Canada ten years ago, had now 200 acres of land of his own, and a commodious lumber house. He was worth between £1,500 and £2,000, and talked of returning to West Birmingham. If that gentleman had remained in West Birmingham he would still have been working there, getting old, and looking forward to the old-age pension which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had promised him ten years ago. What was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham doing? He was working hard to tax the food of the people of this country, in order to enable the gentleman he had spoken of to add another £1,000 to his £2,000. That was a monstrous proposition, and no farmer in Canada had ever asked for it. Colonial preference was interfering with the progress of free trade in Canada. The Conservatives in Canada did not propose anything of the kind. The Conservative Leader in the Canadian Parliament, speaking on the 1st March, 1902, said that he did not believe in dealing with the question of Canadian defence by adopting a preferential tariff which would shut up the mills in Canada, and give increased profits to some manufacturers in Yorkshire. That was not, the speaker said, the way to contribute to the defence of the Empire.

Sir GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said that the Manitoba Legislature had passed a Resolution the other day in favour of Mr. Chamberlain's proposals.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE said of course the farmers in the North-West of Canada were perfectly willing that we should impose a preferential tariff of 2s. per quarter on wheat in their favour, but the question was—would the Canadian manufacturers lower their tariff? He challenged the hon. Member to quote a single responsible Canadian statesman who proposed to abolish, or to reduce, the present tariff on British goods in return for any preference we might give to their wheat. He agreed with the hon. Member who had said that there was a great deal of suffering in this country, and we had got to do something to meet it. No Liberal Member denied that. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose affirmed the principle that we looked to meet that suffering by social reform. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Division, in his straightforward speech, had said that we must try to do away with fluctuations in employment; but the fluctuations in employment were greater in protectionist countries than here. He himself had been perfectly appalled at the evidence which was given before a Royal Commission on which he had sat, as to the time when the efficiency of workmen came to an end. It was a perfectly horrifying reflection to him that at the time of life when professional men in London, and in the great towns, were at the height of their intellectual vigour and skill, the artisan was done with. We had to meet a situation of that kind, but it could not be done by taxing the food of the poor man. Take this celebrated Tariff Commission. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham would not put a workman on that Commission, because he could not afford to pay the expense. [Cries of "No, no!"] Was it wrong for him to quote the reason given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? He was not criticising it. [An Hon. Member: Want of time.] Want of time! If that was the case in regard to workmen, what about the considerable proportion of the community who did not know what would be the effect of these tariffs. They had no trades unions to protect their interests, and could only look to Parliament to see that in any fiscal changes their condition should not be aggravated. What was wanted was to prolong the days of human efficiency in this country, and something might be done in that direction by taking away the temptations to drink. £180,000,000 a year was spent in drink, and yet this Government while talking about protecting the working classes, actually proposed to introduce a Bill to reduce the protection which the working classes already had against drink. He was glad that the controversy had been raised as it had called attention to the position of the people. All they wanted was that instead of resorting to quack remedies they should do something to protect the people against the greed of those great capitalists.

Sir GILBERT PARKER said he was very glad to have an opportunity of saying a few words on the question which had been raised by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. The hon. Gentleman challenged what he himself knew to be a fact, namely, the opinion of Ministers of the Crown in Canada and of leading politicians of the Conservative Party in Canada with reference to preferential trade and reduced taxation on British goods. He was very glad to observe that the hon. Gentleman applied to tariffs on goods a different interpretation to that usually held by those who opposed the views of hon. Members on that side of the House. He said that Lancashire people had to pay taxation amounting to £200,000 in order to get their goods into Canada. If that was the case it was not the consumer but the Lancashire manufacturer who paid the tax.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said that that was not what he stated.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he merely mentioned the point to show the character of the statements which came from those who were preaching the doctrine of absolute free trade which did not exist. With reference to the opinion of leaders of political thought in Canada, he would challenge the hon. Gentleman as to whether for the last twenty years both Parties in Canada had not been in favour of preferential treatment in the British market, and had shown their adherence to that principle of preference by offering this country preference in their own markets on manufactured goods. They were told that it did not amount to much, and perhaps 33⅓ per cent. was not a very great deal, but he wished to point out that in 1893 the Canadian House of Commons passed a Resolution in favour of preference with this country, and when that Resolution was referred to the British House of Commons no less distinguished a Gentleman than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol said—

> "I confess that, speaking for myself, I would go a long way if I could secure a Zollverein between the Colonies and the United Kingdom and some common tariff applicable to them all."

Again and again on public platforms in Canada the leaders of what was called the Conservative Party in that country had supported the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. More than that they had heard to-night about the conference in Montreal and the resolution which was passed at it. It surprised him that the hon. Gentleman who brought up that matter found occasion to oppose the idea of preference in this House, since he helped to draw up the Montreal resolution which approved of the principle of preference. He would ask the House if they thoroughly understood the position taken up by the Colonies in this matter. He thought it was not an unreasonable position. They offered preference, but was this country to give nothing in return? He believed that there was no Legislature in the Colonies that was not prepared, according to their situation and to the tariffs which they adopted for their own needs, to give consideration to British goods. That consideration would naturally be in proportion to their opportunities. It would not be of course, as had been suggested, the taking off of all taxation on British goods. That would be an unreasonable suggestion. What they offered was a fair exchange and a greater reduction on British goods than they gave to any other country.

MR. GUEST (Plymouth) asked if the Colonies had offered a reduction.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said that Canada had offered a reduction of 33⅓ per cent., but they could not expect the Colonies to make a general offer until the principle of preference had been adopted by this country. The Colonies had accepted the principle of preference. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking at the Montreal banquet, said he believed that the principle of preference would be of benefit to Canada, but that they did not wish to press their views on their brethren in Great Britain, and would wait until they had decided what course they would pursue. Surely it was reasonable that Canada, having accepted the principle of preference, should ask this country what course it intended to pursue. He would venture to put this point to the House. This country was taking every year from the United States about 50,000,000 cwts. of corn. The quantity was growing less every year, as the United States was producing less corn in proportion to its population than it produced ten years ago, and it was absolutely certain that, in a few years, this country would have to pay more for its corn whether it liked it or not. It would have to widen the area of supply, and was it not reasonable that it should look to those fields which were within the Empire for securing the corn it required. A 2s. duty on corn would mean that in time of peace and in time of war the food supply of this country was secured.

They had been told by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that this question had been sprung on the country in, so to speak, a night. He did not think that was entirely due to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, because before the right hon. Gentleman spoke there were indications that popular opinion was being roused in connection with this matter. Only a few years ago Lord Rosebery, in a speech which was reported in the palladium of the Liberal Party, the Daily News, drew attention to the matter. He devoted a great deal of time to showing that there was a distinct decline in British trade, and the remedy he found was technical education, throwing the blame for the decline of trade on the uneducated British working man and the unenterprising British manufacturer. He did not believe that the public in this country quite believed that all their difficulties arose from a lack of technical skill. Sir William Ramsay at Bradford had something to say on this question. He said that it was not by technical skill alone that Germany was successful, but also because she applied a scientific tariff in order to protect and develop her trade and enable her to invade the British market. Germany admitted British manufactured goods of all kinds, especially partly manufactured goods, and applied to them technical skill, returning them when completed to the very district where they were partly manufactured. When it was stated that protection only meant high tariffs put on without consideration of any of the circumstances, it showed that the question was not thoroughly understood. Germany applied to her industries the same scientific industry that she applied to her Army, that this country applied to its Navy, and that this country should also apply to its Army. Germany applied that technical skill which this country first taught her, and which came from educated working men. Now, however, it seemed to him that the apprentice was steadily taking possession of his master's business. He did not think it was a matter of congratulation that this country imported £90,000,000 of manufactured goods from foreign countries, at least half of which could be manufactured at home. Was it reasonable that all silks should be admitted free into this country to the detriment of the home silk manufacturers. 200,000,000 cwts. of flour was imported every year. Could not that be manufactured in this country? In such circumstances they ought to consider whether the decline of British trade was not due to something else than the mere competition of other countries. He believed the time had come for reconsidering the position. At present this country sold to the Colonies goods to the value of £109,000,000, and to foreign countries goods to the value of £140,000,000. If the Colonies bought of this country £1 worth of goods for every £1 this country bought of them, would not that be worth considering? The Colonies were young nations, vigorous, productive, and with immense resources, and they would be a source of strength to this country as the competition of other nations became keener, as the invasion of the home market became greater, and as the struggle of the nations enlarged. For himself, he believed that the secret of the future lay in the development of the resources of those young countries. If he were asked if they were to sacrifice anything for the Colonies he would say no, because the struggle of the British workman was great enough already, and the struggle of home industries was great enough. But the Colonies asked nothing for which they were not prepared to give a quid pro quo. They were willing to give this country the corn it needed, and to purchase from this country goods which they now obtained from other countries. They had been challenged on the position they had taken up on the question of tariff reform. He himself could not pretend to any sort of belief that the principle of retaliation was in itself sufficient, for he did not believe they could have effective retaliation unless it sprung from a system of tariffs. How great the tariffs were to be was, however, another question. He did not believe that the people of this country would ever adopt a tariff system like that of the United States. When they were challenged about the success of protective systems in other countries, he thought they were standing upon safe ground. They were challenged about wages, but wages in the United States were double what they were in this country. It seemed to him that he would have the support of the Irish Members, because Irish tobacco was now to receive a bounty, and that was an accptance of the principle of protection. Would anyone deny that the wages of the workmen in Germany had advanced proportionately greater than the wages of the working men in England? During the years 1887 to 1900 wages in England had advanced from 81 to 100 per cent., whereas wages in Germany had advanced from 78 to 100 per cent. That was an important matter, as they had been challenged again and again on the question of wages.

And, it being Midnight, the debate stood adjourned.

CHINESE LABOUR IN THE TRANSVAAL.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH—who had given notice "To ask His Majesty's Government (1) what obstacles exist in the way of a very considerable emigration into the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies of unskilled labourers from the United Kingdom, such as would suffice to develop all local industries; (2) whether the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies, which are under the direct supervision of the Colonial Office, do not impose tariffs upon the importation of foodstuffs, or permit rates having a similar effect upon railways under Government control; (3) what are the tariffs and what are the rates upon foodstuffs"—said: My Lords, two Blue-books and a White Paper have been issued dealing with this subject. I shall, however, make but very little reference to them, because, as it seems to me, they are presented to us in a somewhat imperfect form. In the Blue-book on the Further Correspondence relating to the Affairs of the Transvaal and Orange River Colony there is a long string of despatches from Lord Milner to the Colonial Secretary, but those despatches are not given to us in extenso. We have extracts from them, and I do complain that we are not in an adequate position to consider the question, for we do not really know what Lord Milner's views in full are. Let me illustrate my point. Despatch No. 91 is a most important despatch. It is the despatch in which Lord Milner first urges the Colonial Secretary to agree to the dropping of the instalment, but we are not given that despatch in full. Then, again, in Despatch No. 115 we find these somewhat significant words—

> "We do not look to Indian labour for the mines."

In the interview between Lord Milner and the deputation of the White League in June last, Lord Milner clearly alluded to the possibility of employing Indian labour; but in this Despatch No. 115, which is only presented to us in a fragmentary form, we find the phrase which I have just quoted. I should very much like to know what communications have passed between the Indian Government and Lord Milner relative to employing Indian labour, and I should like to see that correspondence laid upon the Table. If you glance through these important despatches from Lord Milner to the Colonial Secretary, you will find that the same thing applies to Despatches Nos. 117, 127, and others. We are not given the whole despatch, but have to rely for our judgment upon extracts. That is certainly a most unusual form in which to present despatches and communications of this important character to Parliament. My noble friend Lord Ripon will remember that in 1864 Lord Robert Cecil, who was then in Opposition, censured Mr. Low for publishing what he described as garbled reports of the inspectors of schools. Mr. Low, as was his wont, somewhat caustically replied that it was necessary that the inspectors should keep their observations within bounds for the sake of public economy, but that if the House of Commons thought fit the reports should be printed in full whatever they might cost. However, my Lords, even this did not satisfy the House of Commons of that day, and a vote of censure was passed upon Mr. Low, who resigned, and his place was taken by Mr. Bruce, the father of my noble friend Lord Aberdare. I think those of us who object to this proposal to introduce Chinese labour are entitled to see these important despatches in full.

As regards the second Blue-book, containing Reports of the Transvaal Labour Commission, I contend, with all deference, that the Majority Report is of no value to us unless we have the opportunity, which we have not had, of studying the evidence that was given before that Commission. My noble friend opposite points to an enormous book, of which I believe there are only two volumes in the House of Lords. It is absurd to suppose that we can study evidence of that kind in two or three days. It was well known—it was a matter almost of common knowledge—that the majority of the Labour Commission were practically pledged on the subject before they were appointed—not pledged formally, but their opinion was known to be in favour of some outside labour from abroad. Therefore we cannot form an opinion of any value upon the Labour Commission's Report unless we have the opportunity of studying the evidence. The same argument, it seems to me, applies to the Legislative Council, whcih originally passed the Ordinance.

That Council is under Lord Milner, is appointed by him, and his views upon this subject are well known. It cannot therefore be supposed that anything coming from the Legislative Council gives to us a very independent view, or that it has any title to support on that ground. However, as I have said, I shall not deal with what we can extract from the Blue-books.

Fortunately we have facts quite apart from the Blue-books which throw a lurid light upon the policy in South Africa which has culminated in this proposal to employ servile Chinese labour with a view of excluding free British labour. Barely two years have elapsed since the close of the Transvaal War—a war which, while it brought sorrow, anxiety, and suffering into every home, was ennobled by the common spirit of self-sacrifice both of rich and poor, and which we were told was waged with no sordid object, but to equalise the rights of white men and to release the native races from the slavery in which they were held by the Boers. But since that war we have learned a good deal; we have made a good many discoveries. Lord Milner has taught us the new political science that we can equalise the rights of white men by levelling down as well as by levelling up. In place of the old Volksraad, which, after all, did represent a certain portion of the white community, we have a Legislative Council, under Lord Milner, which is absolutely irresponsible to any of the inhabitants of the colony. I hear it suggested that we ought to have a referendum, but I do not suppose the Government will offer it, and even if they did, I do not think, in the present condition of things in the Transvaal, it would lead to a very satisfactory or a very honest result. I am reminded of the sort of plebiscites which were held during the declining years of the Second Empire. No, my Lords, it seems to me that so long as the Transvaal remains a Crown Colony we in this House and the people in this country have a right to decide questions of principle like this. If we want to find an explanation why there is to be no British labour in the Transvaal, and why an English Colony must submit to the very serious and dangerous introduction of Chinese labour, we must look to political and other considerations which, in spite of many contradictions, have remained the permanent policy of Lord Milner's administration. I suppose I shall be told by the Government that, after all, the reason why British labour is excluded and Chinese labour introduced, is purely a financial one. In reply to that plea, I would call your Lordship's attention to language employed by Lord Milner in his reply to a deputation from the White League in June, 1903. What did Lord Milner, on that occasion, say? Addressing the deputation, he said—

> "I cannot make out what you think the policy of the mine-owners is. You assert that they want to work out the mines at an excessive pace, but at the same time you affirm that they are rendering white labour impossible, and that they are not making the least endeavour to get natives."

Mr. Hay replied—

> "They think they will be able to pay higher dividends once they get Chinese labour; hence this policy."

To which Lord Milner retorted—

> "I differ from you in thinking that Chinese labour will be cheaper."

Then, again, are we to be told that the colony is confronted by financial ruin, and that on that account this importation of Chinese labour is rendered necessary and imperative? Again, I would call your Lordships' attention to language used by Lord Milner. Speaking in June last, he said—

> "It is an unfortunate circumstance that so many people seem unable to discuss this question of fact in a temperate manner, but become partisans, so to speak, of a particular solution, and, while exaggerating everything that makes in favour of that solution, decline to see the plainest arguments on the other side. To listen to some extreme advocates of Asiatic labour you would think that this place was on the verge of total ruin. What is really the case? The production of gold even now is greater than in 1895 or 1896, when the Transvaal already was, and had been for some time, the marvel of the world in the matter of gold production. The world progresses, no doubt, but what was fabulous wealth seven years ago is not abject poverty to-day. Not only that, but the rate of production is steadily increasing."

I do not understand how Lord Milner could use that language in June, and use totally different language barely a few months afterwards. If I am told, as I suppose I shall be told by His Majesty's Government, that Lord Milner has changed his mind, I again say that that emphasises and strengthens my claim that we should have fuller information than we have at present. If Lord Milner has altered his mind during these few months, it stands to reason that we cannot be expected to accept his authority as unimpeachable or infallible. We ought to have the full and complete evidence before us which induced him so completely to change his mind on this subject. The financial argument is, I believe, a false and fictitious one. The conduct of the owners is the real cause. The owners of the mines give an insufficient wage, and they treat their men badly. I am not making these statements, as I shall attempt to show, without corroborative evidence. The consulting engineer of the Consolidated Goldfields estimated that the increase of dividends to result from reducing Kaffir wages would be nearly £2,500,000 on the Rand mines per annum. This was a suggestion that was promptly put into action. In the second year of the war there was a conference of mining representatives at Cape Town, when it was resolved that on the opening of the mines the Kaffir wages should be reduced 33 per cent. It is not likely that, in view of this arbitrary reduction of wages, the colony would be specially attractive to free British labour. But, apart from that, the Kaffirs were not, and are not, well treated in the Rand mines. Sir Godfrey Lagden, whose authority, I think, we may accept because he is our Commissioner for Native Affairs in the Transvaal, gives in his return before the Commission the rate of mortality in the De Beers Mines as 30 per 1,000 per annum, but in the Rand mines the rate of mortality is 70 per 1,000 per annum. I will also give you a quotation from two speeches of certainly very impartial people. Dr. Jameson, speaking at Cape Town in November, 1903, is reported in The Times to have said—

> "The De Beers Company would never employ Chinamen; they had plenty of labour, white and black, because they treated their people well."

Sir Lewis Mitchell, speaking at the annual meeting of the De Beers Company, held at Kimberley on 16th November, 1903, said—and his words are very significant—

> "Some statistics have appeared showing the mortality in the Rand mines. I find that the mortality in the Rand was 70 per 1,000, while ours was 30 per 1,000. We attach a great deal of importance to that. We believe the native question is not one entirely of wages. It is a question of treatment and of care. The natives are but men. They are men, not machines. If we study their interests I feel sure when we want more labour we can always get it."

Besides all this, there have been, and are, political motives at work. In the Memorandum on the Mining Industry which the mine-owners presented to Mr Chamberlain on the occasion of his visit to Johannesburg in January, 1902, there was a reference to that "trail of the serpent"—the formation of labour unions. I will read a letter from a gentleman whom I know—a very shrewd man—which throws a clear light upon this question. It is from Mr. Percy Tarbutt to Mr. Creswell, written from St. Swithin's Lane, and it appears on page 171 of the Blue-book. It is as follows—

> "Dear Mr. Creswell,—With reference to your trial of white labour for surface work on the mines, I have consulted the Consolidated Goldfields people, and one of the members of the Board of the Village Main Reef has consulted Messrs. Werner, Beit & Co., and the feeling seems to be one of fear that, having a large number of white men employed on the Rand in the position of labourers, the same troubles will arise as are now prevalent in the Australian Colonies, viz., that the combination of the labour classes will become so strong as to be able, more or less, to dictate not only on the question of wages, but also on political questions by the power of their votes when a representative Government is established."

Not only are these the views of responsible people like Mr. Percy Tarbutt, but they are echoed—perhaps not so clearly, but they are echoed—by Lord Milner himself. For what other meaning can you attach to this? Lord Milner, in his speech in replying to the deputation of the White League alluded to in the Blue-book, used this language—

> "Indeed, it is not merely a question of Asiatics. Constituted as we are we cannot admit an indiscriminate influx of people of a class which the country is unable to digest, whether from Asia or from anywhere else."

It does seem to me quite clear from this evidence and from these facts, that the policy of Lord Milner and of the Government is to exclude from the Colony British labour. On the other hand, I maintain that those who advocate the employment of Chinese labour have to prove not only that every obstacle has been removed, but that every possible inducement has been offered to make the Transvaal British, not only in name, but in fact. The Transvaal was won by British blood. We now know that it is to be paid for entirely out of the taxation of the British people, and we have at the present moment this extraordinary bargain—that while the gold magnates have the gold we are to be left with the exclusive possession of the taxes.

Last, but by no means least, there is a feeling of the deepest repugnance among great masses of our fellow countrymen to this introduction of Chinese labour. Lord Milner, with incomparable taste, chose on one occasion to refer to this feeling of aversion as "the Exeter Hall view," which is always sentimental and always ignorant on native questions. I share with my right rev. friend the Bishop of Worcester some doubt as to what is meant by that epithet "sentimental." I am told by those who have great experience of Asiatics and of their habits that to herd masses of Chinese together in enclosures is productive of moral and social horrors upon which I have no intention to dwell this evening. No one, I think, can accuse The Times newspaper of indulging in sentimentality on this question. An article appeared in that newspaper in January in support of the draft Ordinance. That, of course, we expected, but we did not expect The Times to be so candid as to say—

> "It must be admitted that the lot of the Chinese labourer does not promise to be very gay or very happy from our point of view."

The Times mining correspondent went on to describe these indentured labourers as "muscular machinery." That may be a very picturesque phrase, but I believe it to be a very accurate description of what these Chinese labourers will be. I must say I feel from my heart that this language is also the language of degradation. It implies, I do not think I will say the lowering, but the complete abandonment of every great ideal which has hitherto controlled the relations in this Empire between the governors and the governed. I have no right to expect that, to those whose religion is based upon German philosophy, the Christian tradition can speak with any extraordinary sanction; but there are others—a large and powerful class, who are, I think, sometimes unwisely overlooked by politicians—to whom the Gospel still speaks as a living force. and they feel, and feel deeply, that to use the Chinese or any other subject race as "muscular machinery," as mere machines for our own advantage, is condemned by what is to them the most supreme and the highest law of God. They may appear to the Government to be old-fashioned and out-of-date, but they still cling, and cling with pride and determination, to the greatest and noblest of English traditions—that in all parts of the British Empire, wherever the direct control of Imperial officials is set up, there the people are to be governed for their own good and not exploited for the benefit of our commerce. I am aware that there have been individuals as well as classes who have been content so to use the native races, but I trust and believe that the Christian conscience—and by Christian conscience I speak of what is to me the highest conscience of the country—is sufficiently strong and powerful to put a stop to such a transaction. I beg to put the Question which stands in my name.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON—who had given notice "To call attention to the further correspondence relating to the affairs of the Transvaal and Orange River Colony recently presented, with special reference to the question of the employment of Chinese labour in the Transvaal; and to move for Papers"—said: My Lords, my noble friend who has just sat down has, to a considerable extent, covered the ground of the whole question which I was desirous of raising on this occasion. I do not in the least desire to go over again, so far as I can avoid doing so, the matters with which he has so ably dealt, but I presume it will be for the convenience of the House if I at once proceed with the observations which I was desirous of offering to your Lordships on this subject. The Blue-book contains what I am bound to regard as very disagreeable reading. It shows a very unpleasant state of things to exist at the present moment in the Transvaal—a state of things highly unsatisfactory in financial and, I think I might say, in all other respects. But I do not wish to occupy your Lordships' time by entering upon all the questions which are raised by this Blue-book in one or other of its parts. I shall therefore confine my observations to the question of the proposed employment of indentured Chinese labour in the Transvaal—a question of sufficient importance in itself. This is a subject which requires and demands the consideration of this House and of the other House of Parliament, because there are involved in it matters of so great weight and importance that they ought not to be, and I will venture to say they cannot be, passed over in silence and with indifference.

The Ordinance contained in the Blue-book—the Ordinance for the purpose of establishing a system of Chinese labour under novel and strange conditions—is one which is without any precedent in any part of the King's dominions. I do not make that statement upon my own authority, I make it upon the authority of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The right hon. Gentleman was asked in the other House last night by my friend Mr. Buchanan whether there were any mines in the British Empire worked by indentured foreign labour under conditions similar to those proposed in the Transvaal Ordinance, and Mr. Lyttelton replied, "No, Sir." That was a sufficiently emphatic answer, and I am entitled to say from that statement and from my own knowledge that the system proposed in this Ordinance is without any precedent in any part of His Majesty's dominions. We have, in various parts of our dominions, systems regulating the employment of indentured coolies, but none of them contain such conditions as are set forth in the Ordinance now before your Lordships.

I am not surprised that the conditions of this Ordinance should be remarkable, for there is throughout all English-speaking peoples in every part of the world the strongest objection to admitting Chinese labour into their country. There is a very interesting Paper in one of the Blue-books, containing a report as to the measures taken in various parts of British and American dominions for the purpose of regulating, and, as far as possible, preventing, the introduction of Chinese labour; and it is very natural that those who wish to introduce it into the Transvaal should regard themselves bound to devise some methods which would secure that there should not be competition between the imported Chinese labourers, when their period of work was over, and the ordinary shopkeepers and small traders of the country. They are, as is universally known, very dangerous competitors for persons of that kind, I have seen it myself, in my experience, particularly in Burmah, where the Chinese, by their superiority in certain respects, were constantly driving out their competitors of the intelligent Burmese race. Therefore, those who desired Chinese labour were compelled to devise some system under which it could be introduced into the Transvaal, and yet by which they could prevent, as far as was possible, any one of these persons so brought in being able to at any time leave his employment and turn to other and more profitable undertakings.

That, my Lords, is the basis and history of these special regulations. You dare not bring Chinese labour into the Transvaal or into any other British colony unless you tie it down with these restrictions and prevent the Chinese from entering into competition of the kind I have referred to. These labourers, when brought into the Transvaal, are at once to be shut up in compounds. They are to be confined and crowded together within the limits of those compounds, and are not to be allowed to leave for any reason, except with a permit from their employer which may entitle them to be absent for a space of forty-eight hours. Many of the larger mines will, I imagine, require as many as 1,000—or possibly more—I have heard it put as high as 3,000, and these Chinese labourers are to be confined within the limits of what is called in the Ordinance their premises. They are there to be shut up at an employment in which, according to the statement of my noble friend behind me, the death-rate is 70 per cent., and under conditions which I believe to be contrary alike to justice and to morality.

Allusion has been made to the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Worcester. The right rev. Prelate a few days ago addressed a very admirable letter, which does him the highest honour, to The Times newspaper. That letter has had its effect, because I understand it produced last night a statement of high importance from the Colonial Secretary. I will explain why I am in a little doubt on this point. I saw a report as to the Colonial Secretary's statement in an evening paper last night, and I took up the newspapers this morning, in which a fuller report was to be expected, to see whether they confirmed it. I found, when I looked at The Times, that it was not touched upon at all. There was no mention whatever of it in The Times. I therefore began to doubt whether the evening paper was correct. I next looked at the Standard, and in that paper I found a full confirmation of the report I had seen in the evening paper. The Colonial Secretary was asked by Mr. Herbert Samuel whether, before sanction was given to the Transvaal Imported Labour Ordinance, the right hon. Gentleman would secure that regulations should be made assuring to all Chinese labourers who might be recruited for the Transvaal mines, the right to be accompanied by their wives and children, if they so desired, on terms similar to those that would apply to the labourers themselves. To that Question Mr. Lyttelton replied—

> "I have already stated that it is my intention to take precautions that all reasonable facilities shall be given for the introduction of the families of labourers, and the regulations will be framed with the object of giving effect to that intention. I am unable, however, to give the pledge which the right hon. Gentleman desires, as the preparation of the regulations will occupy considerable time."

That is to say, Mr. Lyttelton was unable to promise that he would not give his sanction to the Ordinance before that matter was settled. That Mr. Lyttelton should have been moved by such a letter as that of the Bishop of Worcester is most natural, and thoroughly in accordance with all that we know of his high character; and I earnestly appeal to His Majesty's Government not to give their consent to this Ordinance until these regulations have been made. So long as you can say to the mine-owners in South Africa "unless you take these precautions we will not consent to your Ordinance" you have precisely that little pistol of which my noble friend the Foreign Secretary is so fond in diplomacy, and you can bring your negotiations with the mine-owners to a successful issue. But once confirm this Ordinance and put it out of your hands, and you will find it not so easy to deal with them in a matter which, if it be settled, as it ought to be settled as a matter of common decency, will entail upon the mine-owners a very large amount of expenditure. If they are to bring, not only the labourers, but their wives and children from China, the expenditure which will fall upon them will be great, and, therefore, I do earnestly appeal to the Government to have these regulations settled before giving their final consent to the Ordinance.

This system which it is proposed to establish is one of semi-slavery. There is no other term to be applied to it. I am afraid I shall incur the censure of Lord Milner for having made that statement. He will think me a most sentimental person. But at least I can say this, that I have never attended a meeting at Exeter Hall in my life, and, therefore, I am not open to the charge of being connected with that celebrated institution. It is not pure slavery, because it is preceded by what is supposed to be consent on the part of the parties who are to be emigrated, but, once they are in South Africa, if they are not slaves, at least they are prisoners, for they are not to be allowed out except under stringent regulations and with a possibility of being arrested at every turn. I should like to have some information from the noble Duke the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies as to what steps are being taken, or are about to be taken, for the purpose of securing that the conditions under which these men are to serve are explained fully to them before they leave China. I know they are to make contracts when they get to South Africa, and that arrangements are to be made there for the explanation of the contracts to the labourers, but how are they going to be explained to them before they leave China? Once conveyed from China to the Transvaal the labourer has very little option but to sign anything that is put before him; but it might be possible, if precautions were taken, to have the terms of the contract explained to him in China, that he might be able to exercise his judgment to a certain extent. I do not press that point far, because we know that recruiters of any kind are not very scrupulous persons, and that they are likely to paint very fine pictures to those whom they are about to engage; but, nevertheless, it would be a satisfaction if the noble Duke could state that proper arrangements are about to be made to secure, as far as possible, that these conditions are explained to the men before they leave China.

The arrangements proposed are, to my mind, highly unsatisfactory and unworthy of the character of this country, for they involve great privations and exposure to conditions and restrictions which render the labourers what my noble friend behind me called "muscular machines." It must be remembered that, if you crowd vast masses of people together into a very small space, you expose them, no matter what regulations you make, to highly insanitary conditions, and these insanitary conditions will increase as time goes on, for if you dump these men down in a small space, they will foul the country.

I pass from that to another consideration which has been largely touched upon by my noble friend who preceded me—I mean the tendency that any arrangement of this kind will have to exclude British unskilled labour from the Transvaal. It used to be constantly said by the late Mr. Cecil Rhodes that one of the great objects of his policy, whether in Rhodesia or in the Transvaal, was to open new fields of employment for British labour. Mr. Rhodes is dead, and those who were his followers and supporters have indeed abandoned his policy. Now, forsooth, it is found to be full of political and industrial danger that the labouring people of this country should be freely admitted to work in the Transvaal. I will not go over again the references upon this subject which have been already submitted to your Lordships—I thank my noble friend for having spared me a good deal of trouble in that direction—but there can be no question that Mr. Percy Tarbutt's letter which has been read by my noble friend is most convincing proof of the truth of that statement. Mr. Percy Tarbutt has been, and, I think still is, a director of some of these companies. He deliberately made that statement. In the debate Sir George Farrar referred to the statement, but did not deny it—he offered no denial whatever to the statement of the opinion held by Messrs. Werner, Beit & Co., as to the introduction of British labour. I do not think that is likely to commend itself to the people of this country. I think, as my noble friend has said, that if you had told them before the Transvaal war began that the ultimate result would be that they would be shut out of industrial employment in the Transvaal they would have taken a very different view of your policy.

Passing from that, I will refer in a few words to the effect of these proposals in His Majesty's other colonies. You have in this Blue-book protests from New Zealand and from Australia against the employment of Chinese. We know the difficulties that they have had in the matter, and the dangers to which those difficulties have at times exposed them. We know, as I have said, the dread of the employment of Chinese which is to be found wherever the British tongue is spoken. It is not unnatural, therefore, that the Australasian Colonies should enter a protest against these proceedings, but I do not desire to put that point too high. I will merely say that their views, which are the results of their experience, ought to be weighed with the utmost consideration by His Majesty's Government, and that their wishes in this matter are entitled to the highest respect. I do not, of course, say that Australia and New Zealand could decide this question. I admit at once that they lie too far from South Africa. Their protest, however, ought to be considered, and is a strong reason for not taking this step unless it is absolutely necessary. But the case of the Cape is very different. The Cape is the neighbour of the Transvaal and is the greatest of our South African Colonies. The Cape has a long-standing tradition upon this subject and has entered its protest. What does the Cape say? I have here the Resolution of the Cape House of Assembly, and it is to this effect—

> "That this House, taking cognisance of the resolution passed at the recent conference held at Bloemfontein on the subject of the qualified approval of the importation of Asiatic labour, desires to express its strong opposition to any such importation as prejudicial to the interests of all classes of the people in South Africa."

That is the view, my Lords, of the Cape House of Assembly, arrived at after the Bloemfontein Conference, and their resolution was followed by a Minute of the Cape Ministers, dated 17th August last year, containing various objections to this proposal. The third of those objections was as follows—

> "Thirdly, in relation to the policy of a British South African Federation which Ministers are most earnestly pursuing, they cannot but feel that the importation of Asiatics will greatly hamper its consummation, as it will induce a highly discordant element between the European natives, and it will certainly complicate, if not altogether prevent, the union of all the Colonies under a Central Administration."

That was backed by a letter from Sir Gordon Sprigg, who was not satisfied with his protest of August, but made another in January last, in which he said—

> "The Prime Minister requests that the Secretary of State for the Colonies may have his attention directed by cable to Minute of 17th August last relating to the proposal to import Asiatic labour into South Africa, and may be informed that the Prime Minister, who is charged with the whole administration of native affairs in this Colony, in which an enormous native population resides, desires to impress on the Imperial Government that nothing has occurred since that Minute was drafted to cause him to alter in the slightest degree the views therein expressed as regards the natives, and especially affecting the great question of federation."

I attach to those views of Cape Colony the greatest possible importance, and I consider them to be entitled to the greatest possible weight. As I have said, Cape Colony is a close neighbour of the Transvaal, but that is not the main reason why their view should be considered, though it is a strong one. The main reason is given in the statement of Sir Gordon Sprigg, as to the fatal effect which the adoption of this policy will have on the great question of federation. I venture to say that there is no man who has paid attention to South African affairs, or who understands the question even in an elementary degree, who will not admit at once that the true solution of the difficulties of South Africa lies in federation. The history of federation in that country has been most unfortunate. My noble and lamented friend, the late Lord Carnarvon, saw what was needed, saw it with an almost prophetic eye, but was, unhappily, too much in a hurry. He took steps to bring about that federation before affairs in South Africa were ripe and failed. Since then other attempts have been made, but not with success. Now a time has arrived when it is more desirable than it ever was before that there should be brought about a federation of these Colonies, if we are to restore peace, tranquillity, and good government to our South African dominions. The Cape Parliament, and, I think, all those who understand the subject, have declared that the importation of Asiatic labour will be more fatal to the success of a policy of confederation than any step that could possibly be taken. I know Lord Milner sneers at this. He says it is nothing but electioneering. That, of course, is what one Party is apt to say of another when an election is impending. We know what it is worth and how to discount it; but surely you could not have a clearer proof that these proposals are universally unpopular in Cape Colony than that neither Party will support them, but, on the other hand, resist them. You find Progressives and Bond alike agreeing to denounce and condemn them, and alike agreeing, as a necessary part of both political programmes, that they should be opposed.

Now, there is another point to which I should like to draw attention, and I am rather sorry that my noble friend the Foreign Secretary has left the House, as it concerns him. I confess I cannot conceive a more unfortunate moment than the present for taking this step and for going to the Chinese Government to negotiate arrangements for taking their people under the conditions of this Ordinance. There is a great war in the Far East, and it should be our object to avoid anything which could in the slightest degree be irritating to China at the present moment, and we know that arrangements with regard to matters of this kind are very apt to lead to prolonged difficulty and disputes. As I understand the position, China is bound by treaty not to resist fair and legitimate emigration of labour from China, but she has a right, also under treaty, to insist that regulations should be made with her for settling the terms upon which, and the manner in which, that emigration should be conducted. I think that to raise the questions which are likely to be raised by the negotiation of such regulations at the present moment will not help the noble Marquess the Foreign Secretary in the tremendous task which lies before him of doing the utmost that he can to prevent this unhappy war extending further. The noble Marquess has fair warning of what is expected of him, because The Times correspondent at Johannesburg in November last wrote—

> "Something more than a mere assent of the Imperial Government to the importation of Chinese will be looked for. To insure the success of the scheme, the active co-operation of His Majesty's representatives at Pekin will be necessary, in order that the Chinese authorities may feel that they are dealing officially with the British Government, and not only with the unofficial British community."

Therefore, if my noble friend, who I see has now returned, follows, I had almost said the mandate of The Times correspondent, he will certainly have his hands full of many thorny difficulties with the Chinese Government, and difficulties that it would be to the interests of this country he should, if possible, avoid.

That brings me to this question: Why is there this tremendous hurry about this matter? You cannot conclude it till you have settled with the Chinese. You cannot get the men out of China, consistently with your treaty, until those regulations are made. I conceive that in these circumstances there is no reason at all why His Majesty's Government should refuse to Parliament plenty of time for the consideration and discussion of this question. Mr. Lyttelton at first said that ample opportunity would be given to Parliament for the consideration and discussion of this question. Since then, for reasons unknown to me, he has drawn back from that declaration, and has said that he will not give anything beyond the period of the discussion on the Address; therefore, in another place this question is to be brought forward at the fag end of a long debate on the Address, covering a vast amount of ground, and at a time when it may be extinguished altogether by means of the closure. I do not think that this is a fulfilment of the pledge—the printed pledge—of Mr. Lyttelton upon this subject, and I say without hesitation that it appears to me that this attempt to burke discussion in Parliament is an indecent attempt. I see the most rev. Primate perusing a Blue-book of which there are only two copies in your Lordships' House. I certainly think it is wrong that so limited a number of copies—two for this House and four for the House of Commons—are supplied to Parliament.

Now, as to the alleged urgency, I have no doubt whatever that it is very desirable to settle this question as soon as possible, but I have some doubts whether the mine magnates in Pretoria are entitled to demand that settlement in the imperious manner in which they are demanding it. These difficulties about labour are very much their own fault. My noble friend behind me referred to the sudden drop in wages. It is utterly unreasonable to suppose that, having made that mistake in 1902, you are in two or three years afterwards to say that you are in such an intolerable position that the whole principle upon which Coolie immigration has been hitherto carried on is to be overthrown to provide labour for the mines. My noble friend read Sir Lewis Mitchell's statement, and showed that those who were connected with the De Beers' undertaking had stated that there was no difficulty in getting labour. It was all a question of good treatment and price. That also ought to be considered. At the same time I do not deny in the least that it is desirable this question should be settled. All I venture to submit is that it ought only to be settled upon just and sound principles, and I hold that the principles of this Ordinance are neither just nor sound.

I want to say one word upon a point which was made by the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition during the debate the other night on the Address. My noble friend Lord Spencer spoke then of 100,000 Chinese labourers being required. The noble Marquess replied that that was a mistake and contrary to fact, and added that there were going to be 10,000 introduced at first, but that certainly 100,000 was quite beyond the mark. The Secretary of the Transvaal Chamber of Commerce in London has circulated a little pamphlet, which, no doubt, your Lordships have seen, in which he says—

> "The demand for native labour for the Transvaal mining industry is in excess of the present supply by about 129,000 men, and whilst no complete data as to the future requirements of the whole industry are obtainable, it is estimated that the mines of the Witwatersrand will require within the next five years an additional supply" (that is, additional to the 129,000) "of 196,000 labourers."

Therefore my noble friend the Leader of the Opposition was not far wrong in the figure which he quoted the other evening. Now, how does the Government meet this question? They meet it by saying that they are going to treat the Transvaal Government as a self-governing colony. It is not a self-governing colony, but a Crown colony. They cannot, by choosing to say that it is a self-governing colony, or by treating it as such, make it a self-governing colony. I wish they could. And they cannot divest themselves of one single atom of responsibility for the whole of these proceedings by professing their desire to treat a Crown colony as if it were a self-governing colony.

It is a bad habit for a man to quote his own speeches, and it is not one to which I readily resort, but I hope your Lordships will pardon me if I venture to refer to the language I used in the year 1899 upon this question of the responsibility of the Home Government for Crown and self-governing colonies. My object at that time was to show that the responsibility of the Colonial Secretary for the administration, and even for the legislation of self-governing colonies, was very small; that he had no power in administration, and little real power inregard to legislation; and that it was most important that that fact should be understood by the country, who should not blame the King's Government at home for anything that they did not like in the conduct of self-governing colonies. I added—

"But in the case of Crown colonies and colonies administered by chartered companies, like the British South Africa Company, the difficulty does not exist. In those cases the Government at home has full power, and, therefore, it is right that it should have complete responsibility. It can order what it pleases and what it thinks right, and, having ordered it, it has the power of enforcing it."

I only give that quotation to show that when no such question as this was before us, and before even the late war actually broke out, I expressed in this House precisely the same views which I am expressing at the present moment, so that none of your Lordships can say I have brought forward this view for the purpose of this particular argument. The government existing at present in the Transvaal is purely a Crown colony government. The Secretary of State for the Colonies is absolutely and fully responsible for everything which that government does—responsible to Parliament, responsible to the people of this country, and it is no use trying to shift that responsibility by saying that the Government chose to treat a Crown colony as if it were a self-governing colony.

The Marquess of Ripon.

My noble friend opposite, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and Leader of this House, gave some reasons for thinking that the opinion of the people of the Transvaal had been satisfactorily and sufficiently tested. I venture to say that there is only one way of really testing the opinion of any people, and that is through the medium, and by the means of, a freely-elected Legislature, guided by a Government responsible to that Legislature, and having its confidence. That is the English method of ascertaining public opinion. My noble friend spoke of plebiscites and referendums. I cannot say I am very fond of plebiscites. I am old enough to recollect certain plebiscites which were not generally considered to have produced satisfactory results, and I am bound to say I doubt whether a satisfactory result would have been produced by a method of that kind, particularly in the circumstances of the Transvaal. Then the noble Marquess the Foreign Secretary rested his case upon three grounds. I suppose he is of opinion that neither of them is quite conclusive, but that by lumping them together he may produce an impression that the proposal is supported by popular opinion. He referred first of all to the resolution of the Bloemfontein Conference. I will read that resolution to your Lordships. It is as follows—

"The Conference is of opinion that the permanent settlement in South Africa of Asiatic races would be injurious, and should not be permitted, but, if industrial development positively requires the introduction of unskilled labourers, under Government control, by which provision is made to indenture and repatriate them at the termination of their articles, it should be permissible."

A more grudging resolution I can hardly conceive. It may have been the result of a compromise, or the result of pressure.

It is anything but hearty. How was it met? It was instantly met by the House of Assembly at the Cape by the resolution which I have read to your Lordships. Therefore, I do not think that the Government are entitled to lay much stress upon the Bloemfontein Resolution.

Then there is the Labour Commission. The majority of that Commission were more or less the intimates of the mine-owners of the Transvaal, and their opinion is not, to my mind, conclusive. Then there is the Legislative Council. I venture to say that the opinion of a nominated Legislative Council cannot and ought not to be taken as the opinion of the people of the country. I am supported in that view by no less an authority than the ex-Colonial Secretary, because Mr. Chamberlain, on 27th July last, after his return from South Africa, said—

> "I am not professing that I am going to take the opinion of the Legislative Council as a final opinion in such a matter."

I do not take it as a final opinion in the matter, and noble Lords opposite can hardly complain of me on that account. Then I come to the petition. Has that petition been examined? Has any one here seen it, or does any one present know how many people signed it in the same handwriting? My noble friend opposite, the Leader of the House, is now an old Parliamentary hand; he has had a large experience of public affairs, and probably knows the value of petitions of that sort, particularly when they are got up under the ægis of mighty corporations, who exercise all the pressure possible for the purpose of obtaining the required result. I cannot see how a petition can be held to be equivalent to the free declaration of an elected Legislature. You may take all these four together, and they do not approach in the smallest degree to the authority which would be afforded you by the Legislature of a self-governing colony; therefore the whole responsibility rests upon the Government. They must defend these proposals; they cannot rest upon the authority of a non-existing Government. The Government must defend the proposals in all their details On them rests the responsibility, and they cannot shirk it. We have not got before us either the free voice of a free Legislature, or even the result of a referendum. We have nothing effectual to show what are the real views of this community. I will go further and say that in this case, in which so great and enormous intercolonial considerations are to be found, I should hesitate long if I were occupying the position of Colonial Secretary, before I could safely, even at the bidding of a free colonial Legislature, disregard those considerations and cast them to the winds. I do hope that it is not too late to make this remonstrance, but I am afraid it is. I am afraid that all the indications go to show that the Government have made up their minds. If they have, it must be so; but, my Lords, they are taking a very weighty and a very grave responsibility upon their shoulders, and they are establishing a system which is unworthy of the character of this country, which is restrictive of the employment of British labour, and which will, I fear, be fraught with the deepest injury to the future progress of South Africa.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty for Papers relating to the affairs of the Transvaal and Orange River Colony, with special reference to the question of the employment of Chinese labour in the Transvaal.—(The Marquess of Ripon.)

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Duke of MARLBOROUGH): My Lords, I remember that at the end of last session the noble Marquess the Leader of this House said, in a speech on the fiscal policy, that he was anxious not only to have a revolver in his hand, but also that it might on occasions be loaded. I cannot help feeling that during the recess noble Lords opposite have purloined that revolver and have loaded it with two barrels and presented it, on the first day that your Lordships have met, at the head of one of the most unimportant members of His Majesty's Government in this House. I recognise the force of the double discharge all the more when I remember what a distinguished political marksman the noble Marquess is who spoke last, but I can assure him that I have no desire to take cover. I will come out into the open and do my best to reply to the many questions and points of view which he and the noble Earl who spoke first have put forward. I think I may say at the outset, in reply to the noble Earl, that the Secretary of State, in submitting this Blue-book to your Lordships and to the other House, has included everything that he thought could be of possible value to your Lordships, and although, as the noble Earl pointed out, there may be certain passages omitted, those passages, I believe, were not at all pertinent to the question; and I think I am right in saying that it is not unusual on occasions to leave out certain passages. The noble Earl said something about reports being "garbled." I do not know whether he was referring to this Blue-book.

The EARL of PORTSMOUTH: What I said was that I should like all these despatches of Lord Milner published in full.

*The DUKE of MARLBOROUGH: The noble Earl has the despatches from Lord Milner in this Blue-book, and the points that are pertinent are included. I notice, moreover, that the noble Earl declined to look at the Blue-book. He said it was of no use to him, and then he proceeded to quote Mr. Tarbutt. If the noble Earl had looked a little more into the Blue-book he would have discovered that the identical passage he alluded to is included in it. The noble Marquess has dealt with many poits of view of the South African question but in order to appreciate thoroughly the question of Asiatic labour it is necessary for us to remember that the financial success of South Africa depends largely upon this great staple industry, the mining industry. Your Lordships will remember, if you go back to the year 1870, that the revenue of the Transvaal at that time was only some £60,000. Up to 1885 it never amounted to more than £200,000; then in 1887 gold was discovered and we immediately witnessed a change. The revenue in that year amounted to £667,00 and we see that each succeeding year following up to the years before the war, the revenue of the country increased in proportion as gold was discovered. In fact, the revenue reached no less a figure than between £4,000,000 and £4,500,000 of money.

The Duke of Marlborough.

I rather understood from his remarks that the noble Earl had some slight misgivings, I can hardly say prejudice, against the mining industry. I know the industry is regarded by some as if it were a kind of speculative concern where one man is pitted against another in order to extract the greatest amount of gold out of the soil. I think that is the wrong view to take of Johannesburg. The mining industry is one huge industrial concern, and the only difference between that and an industry in Great Britain is this, that whereas we manufacture woollen goods, or iron, or steel, the people of Johannesburg manufacture gold. On this industry, which is, as I say, an industrial venture, the success and the prosperity of the colony largely depend. It is their one great asset. As your Lordships are aware, the mining industry has not of late flourished. Indeed, out of the 7,000 stamps that have been put down, I believe only half that number are working, and the immediate result is that the prosperity of the colony is not so great as anticipated. What is this lack of development due to? It is due to the depression in the mining industry. What, again, is that depression due to? Why, to the difficulty with regard to the labour supply. Let us consider a moment this question of the supply of labour, and also the Report of the Labour Commission with regard to it. I understood both the noble Earl and the noble Marquess to criticise considerably the composition of the Labour Commission. I cannot help thinking that it was a fairly representative Commission. I notice upon it some Dutch members and some members of the Johannesburg Town Council, on the whole it seems to me to have been a fairly representative Commission. Anyway, I am sure noble Lords will admit this, that the Commission was perfectly competent to hear the evidence that was brought before it, and that the members discharged their duties in a satisfactory and proper manner. The characteristic of this Commission was that everybody was allowed to express his opinions openly and freely, and although the Minority Report failed to establish their contention, yet they gave their opinion with that freedom of expression, which we are accustomed to from such minorities in a representative system of Government.

Your Lordships will notice that the Labour Commission divided the various territories from which supplies of labour could possibly be recruited under four heads—the districts where free recruiting was permitted, districts where recruiting was prohibited, districts where recruiting was limited, and districts where it was allowed under certain conditions. In the Transvaal itself, it was estimated that there were only 620,000 natives, of whom only six in ten were capable of doing the work. In Swaziland out of a population of 100,000, 6,000 was the maximum number of adults available; in Orange River Colony there was a shortage of labour for local requirements; in Basutoland the Resident Commissioner said that 37,000 men were employed and that the Transvaal cannot expect natives from that country. Then I come to Cape Colony. The evidence shows that there the demand for natives is greater than the supply. In Bechuanaland the Assistant Commissioner said that the full total of natives from that district available would be 2,500. But I would rather draw your Lordships' attention to the conclusions of the Majority Report, which were: (1) That the demand for native labour for agriculture in the Transvaal is largely in excess of the present supply, and as the development of the country proceeds this demand will greatly increase. (2) That the demand for native labour for the Transvaal mining industry is in excess of the present supply by about 120,000 labourers, and it is estimated that the mines of the Witwatersrand alone will require within the next five years an additional supply of 196,000 labourers. (3) That the demand for native labour for the Transvaal industries, including railways, is greatly in excess of the present supply. (4) That there is no adequate supply of labour in Central and South Africa to meet the above requirements.

I gathered that the noble Marquess attached no importance to the finding of the Majority Report. He had some doubt as to its value, but I ask your Lordships is there any other testimony at all that we have to support the finding contained in the Majority Report? What is the experience of the Transvaal Government itself in this matter? Our experience absolutely substantiates the finding of the Majority Report. If your Lordships will turn to page 69 of the Blue-book you will find a telegram from Lieut.-Governor Sir Arthur Lawley, which runs as follows—

> "In view of the existing scarcity of labour, I have decided that the railways must suffer to some extent as well as agricultural and commercial industries."

On page 175 there is another telegram from Lord Milner, in which he says—

> "The immediate prospect is very bad. There is complete stagnation in commerce and enterprise, owing to the labour difficulty, and it affects almost every branch of revenue."

And, finally, if your Lordships turn to page 176, there is a subsequent telegram from Lord Milner, in which he says—

> "There are no signs of an adequate amount of labour being obtained from existing sources of supply. The consequent depression in every kind of business is increasing daily, the revenue is falling off, many people are out of work, and if the situation does not soon change a considerable exodus of the white population is inevitable."

The Minority Report, which I do not think has been alluded to this evening, does not agree with the figures in the Majority Report. They claim that as labour can be found in territories north of latitude 22 in Central Africa and in Uganda, an adequate labour supply should be obtained from those territories, but this is not possible, and I will explain why. The natives who live in Central Africa live in a very hot and tropical climate. They exist upon fruit and vegetables of the district, and if you import them into Johannesburg, which is subject to a very cold and rigorous climate, you find your chances of success extremely limited. I believe, also, that the native supply from Uganda is quite impracticable. Indeed, when Mr. Chamberlain was in South Africa, he admitted that it was very unlikely that any labour could be got from Uganda. I am, moreover, reminded that sleeping sickness exists in Uganda, and that it would be very dangerous to import it into the colony. Indeed, I think if we imported this illness into the Transvaal we might run the risk of bringing about a state of commercial repose at which even the noble Earl on the Cross Benches might feel rather horrified. There is further testimony with regard to the impracticability of using labour from Central Africa. Sir George Farrar himself says—

> "No one would dream of investing capital in an enterprise worked on the assumption of labour being employed from Central Africa."

The Minority Report put the population of Central Africa at 6,000,000, and of South Africa at 7,000,000, making a total of 13,000,000 in all, and then they said that surely out of this enormous population the mining community ought to be able to find a sufficient supply for their requirements. If this had been really the case, we should never have had any labour trouble at all, a Labour Commission would never have sat, and I venture to think this question would never have been brought to the attention of your Lordships. We may just as well dismiss this consideration entirely. It is clear that the evidence before the Commission conclusively showed that everywhere in South Africa where labour might be got, that labour is required by each individual State itself, and that as regards Central Africa and in Uganda, districts to which we might possibly look for a labour supply, all efforts have failed to secure an adequate amount of labour from those parts.

I have dealt with the number of men that are available; let us consider a moment the number of men that are required. Again we find a difference of opinion between the Majority and the Minority Reports. They disagree, in the first place, as to the number of men required on the farms, and, secondly, as to the number required in the mines. The Majority Report states that twenty men per stamp are necessary in the mines, whilst the minority say that twelve are sufficient. All the mining experts who are qualified to judge in this matter are unanimous that the number of men required per stamp is twenty, and I think we require very strong evidence to the contrary to prove that the statement is inaccurate. I am reminded, moreover, that the Rand mines themselves were employing fifteen or sixteen men per stamp before the war, and are now obliged to work with only ten men per stamp. It has been said for some time that these figures have been prepared more or less for the Labour Commission, but that is not so. They form the basis on which the distribution of natives among the different mines was made under what is known as the Native Labour Organisation, and the figures were prepared eighteen months ago, long before this Labour Commission was dreamt of. I think the difference between the Majority and Minority Report is this, that whereas the Minority base their figures on the difference of the requirements of the Transvaal before the war and those of the present time, the Majority base their figures on the difference between those that exist to-day and the full requirements of the Transvaal, supposing the developments were at their full and legitimate capacity. I think our duty is fairly clear. Although we give every consideration to the Minority Report signed by two, yet we have to take into consideration a great deal more the Majority Report signed by ten, and His Majesty's Government are satisfied, in view of the evidence of the Commission and the Transvaal Government being exactly the same in both cases, that there is an insufficient supply of black labour available in South Africa to meet the requirements of the mining and other industries. The noble Earl said he did not think the natives in South Africa had been treated with sufficient consideration, that their wages had not been so satisfactory as he would have wished, and that the reduction of wages on the part of the mine managers was partly the cause of the lack of labour at the present time. But I would remind the noble Earl that it was the Transvaal Government itself which, before the war, reduced the amount of wages to the labourers. It is true that after the war was over the mining authorities did not increase the wages quite so quickly as probably would have been wise, but they were slowly increased from 20s. to 30s., and gradually they were raised to a figure between 60s. and 70s. per month. The noble Earl suggested that the natives were not properly treated.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: I quoted statistics from Sir Godfrey Lagden, showing that whereas in the De Beer mines the rate of mortality was only 30 per 1,000 per annum, the rate in the Rand mines was 70 per 1,000 per annum.

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: What is the noble Earl's inference?

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: If the mortality is double in the Rand mines, it is clear that the men cannot work there under very healthy conditions.

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: There is a great difference. One set of men are working in gold mines, and the other in diamond mines, and, moreover, Johannesburg is a very unhealthy place. The noble Earl will probably know that Dr. Moffatt was recently out in South Africa, and his testimony was that the natives were exceedingly well cared for in all the districts which he visited, and he had no complaint to make as to the treatment they received. Since there is an insufficient supply of black labour, let us consider what other sources of supply there exist. It has been urged to-day by the noble Marquess and the noble Earl that we should use more white labour. In fact, I understand them to say that neither Lord Milner nor the mining authorities had sufficiently turned their attention to this question. Now, what is the evidence in this matter that we have before us? Directly after the war was over, who were the first people to employ white unskilled labour in South Africa? It was the mining authorities themselves. Sir Percy Fitzpatrick went to Lord Kitchener and asked him to allow the use of any men he did not require, and the consequence was that on the mines for which he was responsible they employed some 1,200 men. What was the result of that experiment? They found that after a certain time they were unable to continue using in large quantities white unskilled labour, because the increased cost of the output was so excessive.

The noble Earl referred in the course of his speech to the question of the increased cost of labour, and also to the dividends on the mines. I can assure the noble Earl that, so far as His Majesty's Government are concerned, we have no interest at all in knowing what the dividends are. All we want to know is that the share-holders are satisfied, because if the shareholders are satisfied more capital will be invested in the Transvaal, and as a consequence those subsidiary industries on which we rely for the future prosperity of the country will flourish to a greater degree. Then there was another gentleman, named Mr. Creswell, who tried to employ white labour. What was his experience? The managers of his mine said they were unable to continue using white unskilled labour to a large extent because it became so expensive. The experts in this matter are all unanimous in the opinion that the employment of white unskilled labour is impracticable because of the excessive cost. The noble Earl has referred to the letter of Mr. Tarbutt. It is not my business to defend that letter. It contained an unfortunate expression on his part, perhaps, but I do not think you may generalise from one particular instance. I think I may say that these mining experts and engineers, and everybody connected with the mines, have been actuated in the statements they have made by the highest sense of duty, and have not made false statements for political purposes or political ends.

But there is yet further testimony with regard to the employment of white labour, and that is the testimony of the Transvaal Government itself. It has been said to-night that His Majesty's Government had not sufficiently turned their attention to promoting the employment of white labour in South Africa. What did the Government do last year? We sent out 900 men from this country to be employed on the railways in South Africa, and you will find on page 159 of the Blue-book a full detailed statement of the experience of the Transvaal Government with regard to the employment of white navvies. Our experience was that after nine months the cost was so excessive that we were unable to continue employing these men any longer. There is another point of equal importance. It is this. The black man and the white man will not work together. The white man finds the proximity of the black man extremely distasteful to him, and no one can claim that the force of this argument is diminished when it is remembered that the black man heartily reciprocates the same sentiments towards us. It has been pointed out by the noble Earl and the noble Marquess that this employment of Asiatic labour will curtail the employment of white men. I do not think that that is so. I understand that Asiatic is to be employed more for the kind of pioneer work. His employment necessitates the employment also of Kaffirs in other work, and where the Kaffir is employed, it is obvious that you require white men to supervise him and to act as overseers. The employment of Asiatics therefore, will open up a greater number of mines than are working at present; a greater number of Kaffirs will be employed, and there will be more work for the white man as overseer; so that the direct effect of Asiatic labour will be to increase the demand for white labour rather than to diminish it.

If I may venture to recapitulate my argument, it is this, that the prosperity of the Transvaal depends upon the success of the great staple industry of the country—the great mining industry. The mining industry to-day relies for all its maintenance and success on an ample supply of labour for its requirements, and it is depressed because it cannot get a sufficient supply of labour. The evidence is conclusive that there is not a sufficient supply, as is shown by the Report of the Majority Commission and by the evidence obtained by the Transvaal Government itself. White labour has been tried both by the mining people themselves and by the Transvaal Government, and in both cases it has been found impracticable owing to the expense. The noble Marquess has insinuated that His Majesty's Government desire to burke the discussion of this matter. We have no desire to do that at all. I think he used the words "indecent haste." I can assure him it has not been the wish of the Secretary of State to prevent Parliament from discussing this matter. He has given them the first and most favourable opportunity to discuss the question; and, so far as your Lordships are concerned, you certainly have no complaint to make of the treatment of His Majesty's Government.

Then the noble Marquess said it was impossible for us to treat the Transvaal as if it were a self-governing colony, and that in the last resort we were responsible. Nobody denies that fact, but the reason why the Secretary of State said he was anxious to treat them as far as he could in the position of a self-governing colony was that he desired to continue the policy of his predecessor. The noble Marquess said, amidst the cheers of his followers, that we could not divest ourselves of the responsibility of the government of the Transvaal. We have no desire to do so. On the other hand, Mr. Chamberlain, speaking on the South African War Contribution Bill, said—

> "I believe I can safely, on behalf of the whole House of Commons, say that, although technically they are Crown colonies, and as such subject in the last resort to any ultimatum that may be propounded from Downing Street, the Government will treat them in all matters in which Imperial interests are not directly concerned as if they were self-governing colonies."

That opinion of Mr. Chamberlain's was endorsed by members of the Party to which the noble Marquess belongs, and, having accepted it, I do not think they can blame His Majesty's Government for continuing the policy of Mr. Chamberlain as stated last summer in the House of Commons. Now, I venture to think that in this problem before us, the request of the Transvaal to import Asiatics into their territory, we have to decide in the first place whether this demand is based on grounds which are both reasonable and intelligible, and I trust that noble Lords may think that their demand is reasonable and intelligible. In the second place, after we have decided whether the demand is reasonable and intelligible, we have to make up our minds whether it is in conformity with the wishes of the people themselves. But before considering that point, your Lordships will, perhaps, allow me to remind you of the position of the question when Lord Milner last went back to South Africa. The Report of the Labour Commission became known to us, and it was also known that a Resolution would be introduced in consequence in the Legislative Assembly. His Majesty's Government told Lord Milner that before they could sanction such a measure they must have, first of all, a full expression of opinion from him as to the indications of public feeling in the Transvaal. Lord Milner said, in reply, that he thought the vote in the Legislative Council on the Resolution reflected the full state of public opinion, that the scale of opinion had changed of late considerably, and it will be seen that Lord Milner was strengthened in his opinion by the fact that this Resolution was passed by nine votes to four of the unofficial, and by twenty to four of the official and unofficial members together. We therefore consented to the introduction of a Government measure, always reserving to ourselves the right to modify our views if opinions of a pronounced character or of an organised nature were made against it.

We are censured to-day almost, for the contemplation of the immigration of Asiatics into the Transvaal. It was our view, and we were bound to take into consideration the opinion of the Transvaal itself. We felt that a grave responsibility would be on our shoulders if, without cause or reason, and without any other remedy to suggest, we prevented the discussion of this measure in the Transvaal. The decision of the Legislative Assembly on the merits of the Resolution was received with a general sense of relief, and there were no signs of active hostility to the measure, least of all in the country districts. It was therefore in the belief that this Resolution of the Legislative Assembly represented the opinion and the wishes of the inhabitants of the Transvaal, and that no organised opposition had been made against it, that His Majesty's Government consented to a Government measure being brought in, based on the terms of the Resolution that had alreadybeen adopted. The course we took is justified by the evidence that existed in favour of Chinese immigration. The more we consider it the more we may be satisfied that the conclusions to which His Majesty's Government arrived were both wise in substance and correct in form.

The noble Marquess has dealt very fully with the evidence on this matter in South Africa generally and in the Transvaal. Let us for a moment consider what the evidence is. We must take, in the first place, the opinion of the Transvaal itself. but it would be improper to ignore the opinion of South Africa in general. Let us consider the terms of the Bloemfontein Resolution to which Lord Milner has referred. That Resolution was passed by all the representatives of the colonies in South Africa, who we may believe largely reflected the opinion of the people they represented. It was carried absolutely unanimously, and the statesman who proposed it was no other than the Prime Minister of the Cape, Sir Gordon Sprigg himself. I do not know whether I need read the Bloemfontein Resolution—the noble Marquess has quoted it—but it was to the effect that if industrial development positively demanded it, then Asiatic labourers under a system of patrol should be permitted to enter. The noble Marquess has said that the Cape is opposed to this measure. It is true there is an agitation there—a slight agitation—at the present time, but we hope that it will pass away. If your Lordships will turn to page 187 of the Blue-book, you will see there what Lord Milner says with regard to this agitation—

> "In the Cape alone is there any marked opposition, but this is in the main quite clearly due to electioneering. The Bond is seeking to make up for the votes lost to it through disfranchisement by a bid for the native vote.

I do not wish to dwell too much on the fact that the elections are taking place in the Cape, but I am sure that noble Lords who have had to submit themselves to popular suffrage will remember that frequently matters which in ordinary times did not seem very important assume during an election great importance; in fact, I daresay it has been the experience of some noble Lords that they have been obliged, during an election, to sink all their opinions on Imperial matters in order to discuss domestic questions, such as the vaccination of infants and the dangers to the State of unmuzzled dogs.

I turn from the consideration of the Cape to the other self-governing colony, Natal. What is the opinion in Natal towards this question? In July last a Motion was introduced both into the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly, protesting against the introduction of Asiatic labour into South Africa. That Motion was defeated in both Houses, and in one by an overwhelming majority. I think, therefore, we may claim that there is no direct preponderance of opinion in Natal against the importation of Asiatics. In Rhodesia there has been for some time past a strong desire for the importation of Asiatic labour, and the inhabitants of this country are supposed to regard with favour its introduction, not only into the Transvaal but into their own territory as well. The Orange River Colony has expressed its desire not to interfere with the declared wishes of the Transvaal, and the Transvaal itself is in favour of Chinese labour. It is clear, therefore, that if you take South Africa as a whole, there are four colonies which have expressed their opinion not unfavourably to the proposal, and only one, namely, the Cape, which has during the last two months displayed an unwonted hostility against it. We may claim, therefore, that the opinion of South Africa as a whole is in favour, and not against, the proposals of the Transvaal Government.

I now come to the expression of opinion in the Transvaal itself. What evidence have we in this direction ? This evidence is the most important of all, because I think that we must admit that this matter is one which, as it affects the Transvaal directly, should be to the greatest extent determined by the opinions and wishes of the colony itself. We have, in the first place, the expression of opinion of the representatives of the Transvaal who supported the Bloemfontein Conference Resolution. In the second place we have the evidence of the majority of those who sat on the Labour Commission. We have, thirdly, to remember that the principle of the Ordinance was passed in the Legislative Council by a considerable majority, and that the Second Reading of the Government measure was carried without a division. Fourthly, there is the evidence of the Dutch population themselves. Ben Viljoen's evidence before the Commission is one which we cannot ignore. He said a great number of Boers see and feel the state of things at present prevailing through the state of the labour market, and would, therefore, agree to supplement the labour supply by importing labour if done under strict rules and proper legislation.

This statement which I have quoted agrees with the opinion that Lord Milner expressed, that while the majority of the Dutch are anxious to see the experiment of Asiatic labour tried, they are not prepared to give strong expressions of opinion in favour of it. We believe that, though the Legislative Council is no doubt a nominated Council, it does not possess in a Parliamentary sense a representative character; nevertheless, the decision they have taken on this subject is a decision in the best interests of the colony, and does not misinterpret the wishes or offend the sentiment of its population. I notice that my noble friend Lord Tweedmouth does not agree with my remarks. Noble Lords opposite may be right, and we may be wrong, but if we are right, I am reminded that this will not be the first time in the annals of our political life when an Assembly elected not on the basis of a popular franchise has rightly interpreted the desires and wishes of the people whose trustees they are. Reference has been made to a referendum, but I gather that both the noble Earl and the noble Marquess agreed with His Majesty's Government that it would be unnecessary and unwise to have had recourse to a referendum.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: Because it is dishonest.

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: Why a referendum should be dishonest I fail to understand. However, I agree thoroughly with the noble Earl and with the noble Marquess that it is not necessary to have a referendum.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I only said that I thought a referendum was not a good method of obtaining the views of the public. I do not say that a referendum would not show better than your present testimony what the views of the people are.

*THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH My point is this: What is the use of having a referendum when it is not really required ? Why should we put the colony to the vast expense and trouble of this novel and unprecedented method ? The object of a referendum is to enable people to reject a measure they dislike without destroying a Government of which they approve, but by a referendum I do not think you would get that exact expression on the merits of the case which those who advocate a referendum are so anxious to ascertain. Though the opposition of the introduction of Asiatic labour is a natural one, and one with which we sympathise, yet we must not forget the problem that we are called on to solve. Are we prepared to arrest that development of the Transvaal which the inhabitants themselves have tried to build up? The superstructure which has been created during the last two years, a superstructure which comprises such items as railway extension, extensive municipal works both in Johannesburg and Pretoria, and vast sums of money laid out on the Rand water supply—this superstructure has been built up in the belief and in the anticipation that it would be sustained by the increased development of the main staple industry of the country. If we are not prepared to arrest this development, then we are reminded that the Resolution of the Bloemfontein Conference was founded on reasonable ground—

> "That if industrial development positively demands it, unskilled labourers under a system of Government control should be permitted."

This Ordinance, and the conclusion contained in it, we believe place the immigrants under Government control. The evils of importation of Asiatics have been dwelt on. I would only remind you, in reply, that whereas other countries have imported Chinese first of all and then legislated for them, the Transvaal proposes to legislate for them in the first place under a system of control, and then allow them to enter into the Colony. It is in the assurance that the attitude of His Majesty's Government towards this question has not been that of blind favouritism, born of a first impression, but the conviction that there is no other solution, that I hope you will record your sanction to the methods which the Transvaal Government have taken to solve this difficult and complex problem, a problem concerning which the Transvaal is so anxiously and so earnestly awaiting the decision of the Imperial Parliament.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I approach this question from a somewhat different standpoint from that occupied either by the noble Earl who opened the discussion, or by the noble Marquess who succeeded him, for whatever difference of opinion may ultimately exist as to the urgency of the problem which has now to be solved, I should have thought that it would have been impossible for anyone who had studied the Blue-books carefully not to realise the immense difficulty which surrounds it. In the speech made in opening the debate, the subject was referred to as though the solution was not really a matter of any difficulty; all we had to do was to refuse to assent to the proposal which had emanated from the Transvaal itself. To my mind, the matter is far more complex. Indeed, I am not prepared to say that, great as are the objections to this immigration, the difficulties are not equally great if we were simply and bluntly to follow the course which the noble Earl has suggested. I do not desire to enter into a discussion on the economic or the political aspects of the question. I wish to deal simply with the moral aspect of the subject, which it seems to me has been treated with strangely little consideration, both in the correspondence which appears in the Blue-book, in the resolutions passed by the various South African bodies for and against the proposal now made, and in the speech of the noble Duke. It does seem to me that sufficient attention has not been given in any of these quarters to a matter which lies at the root of the question before us.

I have read without the slightest preconceived idea, and certainly, so far as I know, without bias, all the material which has been circulated on the subject. I will not profess that I have been able to look through that huge and priceless volume, which is one of the rarest of the treasures possessed by our library, but by the kindness of the noble Duke I have been allowed to glance at the copy in his custody, and I have examined the index, from which it does not seem that the moral aspect of the subject is alluded to in the multitudinous pages. This appears to me the more strange inasmuch as there exist in records of the past long accounts of discussions which took place half a century ago upon the difficulties that surround the moral, or, if it is preferred to call it so, the social aspect of this question. I do not for a moment believe that the Government is advocating this particular solution of the labour problem simply because it is important to secure better dividends for mine-owners. I do not for a moment share that view. If better dividends are wanted from the mines, it is because the prosperity of the two new Colonies cannot, so far as it appears, go forward as we wish, unless this the greatest and most important industry of that region continues to be successful. Therefore those of us who are thinking more of the moral and educational progress of the Colony than of its monetary wealth, are yet actively concerned in the endeavour to make the mines profitable, because we appreciate that the immediate question of dividends is secondary to far greater interests beyond.

I want to press the point that whereas in the past history of our different colonies, when there has been consideration of this question of Chinese immigration, there have been minute arrangements made for meeting the moral and social difficulties surrounding it, these difficulties do not appear to have received any adequate consideration in the present case. This is to me a new study; but it will be remembered by some of your Lordships that during the years 1852 to 1858 there were discussions upon the introduction of Chinese labour into the West Indies, into Trinidad, into British Guiana, and to some extent into Mauritius; and your Lordships will find that when the subject was under discussion in those years there was letter after letter, despatch after despatch, and witness after witness was called upon to discuss and deliberate upon the regulations that could best be made for preventing the moral evils that might result from such immigration. There were communications for example from Mr. Consul Alcock, then at work in China, and afterwards so well known to your Lordships as Sir Rutherford Alcock, in which he indicated the perils of bringing together large numbers of male Chinese, in the manner now suggested. Again there was a correspondence between the Colonial Land Commission and the Duke of Newcastle in 1854 on the subject. Many examples I might give to show that this is a matter requiring an amount of careful consideration it does not seem to me to have received on the present occasion. What I feel is this. After reading what has been put into our hands and comparing it with what was done half a century ago on similar occasions in dealing with our Colonies or other lands, and after to-night listening to the noble Duke, I remain as ignorant as I was before as to what are the plans, the hopes, or the anticipations of His Majesty's Government on this particular point. Has it been considered, and if so, where shall we find the results of that consideration? If the gravity of the problem has not been considered, then it is high time that we should give attention to it.

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

If the Government can tell us the matter has really been duly weighed, and that plans have been made, and are expected to work satisfactorily, then I would not press that all such particulars or such details as the noble Marquess has asked for should be given to us before the Ordinance is sanctioned. I trust, however, that before the debate closes more information will be given to us with regard to the several regulations which are left to the discretion of the Lieutenant-Governor, subject to the approval of His Majesty's Government. We have in these Blue-books three copies of the Ordinance, and they differ widely in regard to the possibility of wives and families accompanying or following the labourers. The first draft of the Ordinance as enclosed in the despatch of 5th December, has two or three clauses upon the subject, making the introduction of wives and children lawful, but these disappear in the second draft, given to us at a later date, and we merely have the provision that the Lieutenant-Governor may make regulations for the introduction, repatriation, and control of families. In the third copy this provision remains, and, further, there is a clause providing that it shall not be lawful for the wives or members of any family belonging to the race or tribe of any labourer to enter or reside in the colony except under conditions there alluded to. We want to know, not necessarily in detail, but in the roughest outline what the conditions are. We want to be assured that this system of indentured immigration will not be introducing a poison of a terrible kind into the community where the Chinese may be settled. If it is said this poison cannot be introduced because of the restraints put upon the immigrants, and that the evil cannot become rampant, because the Chinamen will be deprived of all liberty of action, or locomotion, or intercourse with other people, such a line of defence strikes one as in itself difficult to justify. At all events it is certainly a form of administration a little difficult to reconcile with the liberties and freedom which should exist in a British colony. It may be that the regulations have been well thought out, and that His Majesty's Government can tell us in outline how they mean to deal with the subject; but we ought to pause before we allow what is now proposed to go forward until we know that it is not going to be a source of moral and social evil in circumstances of which we have abundant examples in the history of the past in our own colonies and in those of other nations.

Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Earl Grey.)

On Question, Motion agreed to.

THE LOADING-PORT CLAUSE.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to again call the attention of His Majesty's Government to the Board of Trade Circular Instructions to the Superintendents of Mercantile Marine Offices relative to the loading-port clause in the articles of merchant ships; to point out further cases where this circular has caused shipowners and shipmasters great expense and inconvenience; and to ask whether they have yet received the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, to whom this matter was submitted over eight months ago. This is a subject which I introduced to your notice in the early part of May last year I, would not trouble you further upon it but for the serious fact that, although eight months have elapsed, nothing whatever appears to have been done towards removing a prolific source of trouble and expense to shipowners.

Perhaps to some of your Lordships this loading-port clause in ship's articles may be unfamiliar; therefore I may say that it is simply a clause whereby the crew of a ship in their agreement with the master agree to remain on board the ship until her arrival at the port in the United Kingdom where she may load. For instance, a ship may perhaps be bound to Hull to discharge her cargo, proceeding then to, say, Cardiff, to load, this being generally assumed as the completion of the voyage. The Board of Trade, however, voluntarily issued circular instructions to their superintendents to the effect that if the crew demand to be paid off at the port at which the ship discharges her cargo, they cannot be legally compelled to carry out their own agreement in the shape of remaining by the ship until she arrives at her loading port. This has given ships' crews an opportunity to harass shipowners and shipmasters, and to cause them great and needless expense.

In my remarks last year I quoted a case occurring in the Thames Police Court, where the legal decision was given directly against the terms of the Board of Trade circular. Since that case happened there have been several of an identical character. One decision, I believe, has been given in favour of the men, but this only shows the unsatisfactory nature of the whole position. With the exception of this one case the legal decisions have been all the other way. The action of six seamen against the captain of the steamer "Concord" at Aberdeen was dismissed by Mr. Sheriff Begg, the defendant being allowed £1 1s. expenses. At Salford a seaman sued the captain of the steamer "Alfalfa," but the stipendiary said he had little doubt about the merits of the case, and the summons was dismissed. At Birkenhead a seaman of the "Petunia" sued the master of the vessel, but the justices described the loading-port clause as "an old and accepted form of agreement," and, in adopting what they called a "common-sense view," dismissed the case. Common-sense seems to be absent from some of the Board of Trade circulars. There is also the case of a fireman of the steamer "Lobelia," who at Londonderry sued the master in a similar manner, and this summons also was dismissed.

I think I have shown to your Lordships sufficient to indicate the mischievous results which have accrued from the official circular issued by the Board of Trade. Not only is it an unwarrantable interference with our shipping interests, but it is throwing dust in the eyes of seamen, who, very mistakenly, thinking they can place absolute reliance on the pronouncements of the Board of Trade, take action in a Court of law against their superior officers. In every case but one this has subjected them to expenses and costs which they can ill afford to bear. I hope to hear that the opinion of the law officers of the Crown on the subject has now been received—it is quite time it was—and that it will result in the withdrawal of the circular which has been so emphatically condemned by shipping interests. I would also draw your Lordships' attention to the extraordinary action of the Board of Trade in issuing this circular without having first asked the opinion of the law officers of the Crown.

Lord WOLVERTON: My Lords, the Board of Trade have not been unmindful of this important matter, and on the advice of the law officers decided to take steps to obtain, by proceedings to which the Board of Trade would be a party, an authoritative decision on the validity of the Loading-Port Clause referred to in the circular instructions of the Board. After careful consideration, they decided that a friendly test case would be the best course, and, with that object in view, they invited representatives of the Shipping Federation to attend a conference. The Board of Trade are perfectly aware of the decisions quoted by the noble Lord, but, having regard to the great importance of the matter, desired a decision of the High Court. The Shipping Federation have, however, recently notified the Board that the clause in question has been altered, and the clause as altered is under the consideration of the Board.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Portuguese Tariff Bill and Lancashire Cotton Trade.

MR. WHITE RIDLEY (Stalybridge): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the Tariff Bill now being introduced by the Government of Portugal, which proposes largely to increase the import duties on cotton and mercerised goods; and whether, in view of the importance of this question to Lancashire exporters, the British Government have any means, by commercial treaty or otherwise, of bringing pressure to bear on the Portuguese Government with a view of modifying the proposed tariff.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) My attention has been directed to the Portuguese Tariff Bill referred to by my hon. friend. At present no commercial treaty exists between this country and Portugal, but the matter has been the subject of representations to the Portuguese Government.

Conference in Egypt on Cotton and Bourse Gambling.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a conference consisting of the representatives of seventeen Governments assembled in Egypt to consider cotton and Bourse gambling in that country; and, if so, will he say whether he can arrange that reports of the proceedings will be furnished to the House.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) I am aware that the organisation of the Egyptian courts (which is reconsidered once in five years) is under discussion by a mixed Commission, and that one of the subjects proposed for consideration by the Commission was legislation on futures. When the Commission has concluded its deliberations, His Majesty's Government will ascertain from the Khedivial Government how far any portion of its Report referring to this subject can be published.

Future and Option Gambling in Canada.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Criminal Code of 1892 of Canada imposed five years imprisonment and 500 dollars fine on persons making bargains in fictitious goods, wares, or merchandise in Canada or elsewhere with the intent to make gain or profit by the rise or fall in prices, and that this Act received the assent of the Governor-General in 1892, while the despatch leaving the code to its operation was dated March, 1903, and was signed by Lord Ripon; and whether he can explain the omission regarding this legislation from the Blue-book recently issued on the subject of future and option gambling.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) The Blue-book includes on page 10 the full text of the Minute of the Canadian Privy Council, furnished in reply to the despatch addressed to the Canadian Government at the instance of the hon. Member, as to the nature and effect of any legislation in force in Canada prohibiting or restricting gambling in option and future contracts as regards foodstuffs. I can only assume that the brevity of the reference to Sections 201 and 202 of the Criminal Code arises from the fact that, as stated in the Minute, no prosecutions have ever been instituted under these sections.

Import Duty collected on Wheat, etc., from British India.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state approximately the amount of corn duties collected on wheat, rice, and other grain from British India during the period while the recent registration charge of 1s. per quarter was in force.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) The approximate amount of duty paid on corn and grain imported from British India during the time the corn and grain duties were in force was £201,000. Of this amount £128,000 was paid on account of wheat, £52,000 on account of rice, £20,000 on other grain, and £1,000 on farinaceous substances.

Learners in the Cork Post Office.

Mr. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): To ask the Postmaster-General why male telegraph learners in the Cork Office, who have recently qualified, are still on half-pay, and are compelled to perform two hours work per day in the sorting office without remuneration, on the ground that they are learning their duties.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) I am making inquiry on the subject, and I will communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Contracts for Coal Supply to Enniscorthy Post Office.

Sir THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General if his attention has been called to the matter of the contracts for the supply of coal to the Enniscorthy Post Office; and if he will call for the correspondence which has passed in the case between Messrs. Donohoe, Limited, and the postal authorities.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) My attention has not been called to the question of the supply of coal to Enniscorthy Post Office, but I will make inquiry on the subject and communicate the result to the hon. Member.

Carriage of Mails between Limerick and Tralee.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will state why the mails are not now carried by the Great Southern and Western Railway Company between Limerick and Tralee.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The Limerick and Tralee Railway is used for some of the mails for the district it serves; but the remainder are now sent by road because the railway company refused, some time ago, to continue to run trains at hours suitable for them except for a payment far beyond what would be justified for the service.

Betting Legislation.

Mr. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether he will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill in the present session to deal with betting.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers Douglas.) I can only say that the Government have not found it possible to include this subject in their programme of legislation for the present session. At the same time, if a Bill dealing with street betting on the lines of the provisions recently obtained by several local authorities in their Private Acts were introduced by any hon. Member, it would, I think, deserve the favourable consideration of Parliament.

Record of Cancer Cases in India.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have yet arranged to have cases of cancer recorded separately in dispensary and hospital returns.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The revised returns provide a separate column for cancer cases, but I cannot say if they have actually been brought into operation. The Government of India have the matter in hand.

Practical Cookery Instruction in Irish National Schools.

MR. KENNEDY (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the managers of a number of national schools in Ireland have provided cooking stoves and other appliances to give effect to the programme for instruction for cookery, particularly those for girls in the higher standards, prescribed by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland for the present financial year; that in the notes to teachers issued by the Commissioners in November, 1902, it was intimated that instruction by practice in the simple forms of food preparation would be continued for some years; and, whether, seeing that the Commissioners have eliminated from their programme for the coming year practical instruction for cookery, particularly in the higher standards, except for convent schools, and in view of the expense that has been incurred, the Commissioners will apply the new programme for cookery in fifth and higher standards to all rural schools so equipped where the manager applies for same, on the ground that the arrangements for instruction in cookery by itinerant instructors are insufficient.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I am informed by the Board of National Education that provision for instruction in domestic economy in national schools is at present the subject of communication between the Board and the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction. It is not practicable, therefore, at present to add anything to the statement made in the introduction to the new programme. Cases, however, like that referred to in the Question will have the fullest consideration.

Audit of Belfast County Borough Accounts.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain why, in the reports made by the Local Government Board auditor on the Corporation accounts of the Belfast County Borough for the year ending 31st March, 1903, no reference has been made by the auditor to a series of complaints made to him; and will he give facilities to have an audit made by a competent firm of auditing accountants who would accept the responsibility of auditors.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham). The auditor referred, in his report, to the representations made to him in respect to the question of rent to be paid by several trading undertakings and the excessive allowance for deputation expenses. Most of the objections were in the nature of criticism of the administration by the council of matters which were within its discretion and in which the auditor has no authority to intervene. The Board has perfect confidence in the auditor and is satisfied there are no grounds for superseding him as suggested.

Dublin Metropolitan Police—Retention on Active List of Superintendents Narrisey and Dempsey.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state why Superintendents Narrisey and Dempsey of the Dublin Metropolitan Police are retained on the active list, they being eligible for retirement on pension.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) There is no fixed period for the retirement on pension of members of the Dublin Metropolitan Police. They are permitted to remain in the service so long as they discharge their public duty with efficiency and to the satisfaction of their superior officers.

Erection of Technical Schools in Ireland.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is prepared to state what the Government intend doing with respect to the provisions of a building fund for the erection of suitable technical schools in Ireland; and whether it is intended to continue the equivalent grant upon the original terms, as understood by the local authorities who levied a rate, to aid in supporting technical schools within their rateable area.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I discussed these matters with the deputation that waited on me in Dublin on the 18th January, and have no further statement to make at present.

Resolutions of Asylum Committees.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of resolutions adopted by the Conference of Asylum Committees at a meeting held in Richmond Asylum on the 25th and 26th November last; and, if so, will he state whether he proposes to deal with the points raised.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The resolutions propose (1) an increase of the present capitation grant of 4s. per week in respect of the maintenance of each pauper lunatic; (2) an extension of the period for, and alteration of the conditions upon, which loans are made for asylum purposes; (3) the establishment of a central laboratory in connection with asylums; (4) the introduction of a system of boarding-out of persons of unsound mind; (5) the assimilation of the capitation grant payable in the case of patients maintained in auxiliary asylums established under Section 76 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1898, to that payable for patients in district asylums. In respect to (1), the amount of the grant in Ireland is the same as that payable in England and Scotland, and a proposal to increase it could only be considered in its application to the United Kingdom as a whole. Legislation would be necessary to give effect to the recommendations at (2), (4), and (5), and I am unable to undertake that such will be introduced during the present session. There are no funds available at present for the establishment of a central laboratory (3).

Marine Works in Connemara.

Mr. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the Marine Works Act of last year is not put into operation in Connemara; if he will state when the proposed works under the Act for Cleggan, Clifden, and Roundstone, in Connemara, are likely to commence; and whether, in view of the approach of the fishing season in these districts, steps will be taken to execute the proposed works at the earliest day.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) With respect to the proposed works at Cleggan and Roundstone the Government has not yet received from the County Council the memorial and resolution prescribed under the Act. Forms for this purpose were communicated to the council early in August last. With regard to Clifden negotiations are still in progress.

Construction of Military Maps.

Lieut.-Colonel TUFNELL (Essex, S.E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the map made of the country north of Ladysmith on a scale of four miles to an inch in 1896 has been continued southwards as recommended by the Director of Military Intelligence; and whether, in view of the want of funds for the provision of maps for military purposes during the late war, any additional funds are now available to enable the Intelligence Department to perform their duties satisfactorily.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) Arrangements are now in progress for surveying the whole of British territory south of the Zambesi on a scale suitable for military purposes provided the co-operation of all the Colonial Governments can be secured. The whole question of increasing facilities for map preparation by the Intelligence Department is now receiving careful consideration.

Construction of Railway Embankment between Chiromo and Blantyre.

MR. WEIR: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that large quantity of the material used in the construction of the embankment of the railway between Chiromo and Blantyre was taken from the banks of the Shiré river, and that, owing to the nature of the material many miles of the embankment were washed away during the wet season; and, if so, will he state if the construction of the railway is under contract; and if so, at how much per mile.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) I am not aware of the facts alluded to by the hon. Member. The conditions under which the railway in question is being constructed were explained in Africa No. 9 of 1903 (p. 3).

Chinese Government and the Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what steps have been taken by him to ascertain the views of the Chinese Government on the regulations with regard to the proposed introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the Transvaal, which, in the despatch of 16th January, he stated His Majesty's Government considered to be necessary before sanctioning the Ordinance.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) His Majesty's Government are in communication with the Chinese Minister in London on the subject.

War Office Intelligence Department.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what recognition, if any, has been accorded to Sir John Ardagh, Major Altham, and the other officers of the Intelligence Division, for the preparation during the years 1896–1899 of memoranda, and the summarisation of these memoranda in the Handbook of Military Notes in June, 1899, of information which, according to the Report of the Royal Commission on the War in South Africa, gave a correct impression of the numerical strength, armament, and plans of the Boers.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER, Belfast, W.): It is not customary to reward officers for faithful performance of the ordinary duties which appertain to their respective offices; and the preparation of the information alluded to forms part of the ordinary office work of the Intelligence Department. Sir John Ardagh was made a K.C.M.G. after his retirement in 1902, and Colonel Altham has been promoted to a substantive colonelcy.

South African Reservists—Rifle-sights.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can explain how it was that every Lee-Enfield rifle placed in the hands of each of the 25,000 Reservists who were sent to South Africa in the winter of 1899 was so sighted that the rifle shot eighteen inches to the right at 500 yards; and what steps have been taken to prevent the recurrence of such an error.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: As regards the first part of the Question will the hon. Member kindly refer to the ample information given on this subject by my right hon. friend the Chief Secretary, during the debate on the Queen's Speech of 1st February, 1900.† I may, however, point out that the error of the position of the sight was only $\frac{3}{100}$ of an inch. As regards future action a more stringent system of inspection of the sighting of rifles has been adopted so as to guard against a recurrence of this error.

Military Armaments, Stores, etc.—Precautions against Deficiencies.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can explain why, at the outbreak of the Boer War, there was the deficiency in armaments, reserves of guns, ammunition, stores, and clothing, and in regard to the power of output of material of war in emergency, described in Sir Henry Brackenbury's Minute of 15th December, 1899, and what steps have been taken to render this state of affairs impossible in the future.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I am afraid that it is not possible within the limits of a reply to a Question to give an answer to the first part of this Question, but if the hon. Member will kindly refer to Paragraph 55 of the Report of the Royal Commission he will find considerable information on the subject. As regards the second part of the Question, the provision of the guns, stores, clothing, etc., recommended by the Mowatt Committee is being carried out; and will practically be completed by the middle of 1904. To guard against a recurrence of deficiencies of stores it has been decided that the reserves shall be permanently maintained, and that any guns, ammunition, stores, or clothing withdrawn for service shall be immediately and automatically replaced.

Galway Harbour — Naval Visits.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN (Galway): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state the number of His Majesty's cruisers visiting Galway Harbour during the past twelve months; and whether the harbour was visited during the year by foreign cruisers.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. PRETYMAN, Suffolk, Woodbridge): His Majesty's cruisers "Good Hope," "Drake," "Hogue," "Sutlej," and four destroyers were at Galway on 30th July, 1903, during His Majesty's visit to Ireland; and His Majesty's cruiser "Hawke" visited Galway in May, 1903. H.M. Gunboat "Skipjack" also visited Oranmore, near Galway, in December, 1903. The only foreign war vessel that has been reported as visiting Galway since the 1st January, 1903, is the French first class protected cruiser "Guichen," which was sent to search for the missing French transport "La Vienne" on the West Coast of Ireland. She put in at Galway on the 23rd January last, and left that port on the 25th of the same month.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN: Are we to understand that the Admiralty consider this harbour perfectly safe?

Proposed Coaling Station in South Wales.

MR. OSMOND WILLIAMS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether His Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of accepting the offer of a port in South Wales as a Government coaling station and store depôt, which port lies within some nine or ten miles of a number of collieries upon the Admiralty list, and was offered at a rate which would practically render it self-supporting, and at which arrangements could be made for the storage of 300,000 to 500,000 tons of smokeless South Wales coal, which could be loaded at all times without dislocation of trade in South Wales or the payment of any emergency prices.

MR. PRETYMAN: It is not considered desirable to accept the offer, as no circumstances, in the opinion of the Admiralty, are likely to arise that would render such a course necessary, nor is it desirable to store a large quantity of coal in South Wales, as it is of importance that coal shipped for the naval service should be fresh wrought.

British Indians and Transvaal Draft Ordinance.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India has given its assent to Clause 34 of the Transvaal Draft Ordinance, by which Clauses 22 to 28, dealing with the return of labourers to their country of origin, shall apply to British Indians.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Government of India has not been consulted as to any clause of the Transvaal Draft Ordinance, nor is its assent necessary; but, subject to the authority of the Secretary of State in Council, it controls the exportation of labourers from India, and its action will of course depend on the state of the law on the subject in the Transvaal, as well as on other considerations. I may add that the clause to which this Question refers is intended to have only a temporary effect, pending the passing of special legislation on the subject of Indian labour.

MR. BUCHANAN: Has the Secretary of State for India given his assent to these clauses in the Transvaal Ordinance?

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir, I have given no assent to any ordinance at present.

Transvaal Labour Ordinance—Transfer of Importers' Rights.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the Transvaal Labour Ordinance, if he can explain why the provision requiring the assent of the labourer to any assignment of the importer's rights has been withdrawn; whether the effect of the Ordinance as amended is that the rights to the services of the labourer may be assigned without his consent; and whether he proposes to ask the approval of Parliament to this part of the proposed legislation.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): Under Section 11 of the Ordinance, transfers can only be made with the sanction of the Lieutenant-Governor and under regulations to be made by him, and due notice of transfers is to be given to the Superintendent of Labourers. It appears to me that these provisions enable the Lieutenant-Governor to take any steps which circumstances may render necessary in regard to the assent of the labourer to any proposed transfer. I do not propose to ask the approval of Parliament to this colonial legislation. The disallowance of such legislation is vested in the Crown acting on the advice of the Secretary of State, and if, after the discussion on the general question of the introduction of Asiatic labour, I should feel it my duty to advise His Majesty not to exercise his power of disallowance, Parliament will have the usual opportunities of criticising my action.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON asked whether the regulations to be made would contain a provision requiring the assent of the labourer to his being transferred?

MR. LYTTELTON: I cannot answer that at present.

DR. MACNAMARA: Under the Ordinance as it now stands, is the assent of the labourer necessary for his transfer to a new employer?

MR. LYTTELTON: I have answered that Question.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Would it be possible under the Ordinance for the right of transfer of these Asiatic labourers to be put up to public auction?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. The Ordinance cannot be debated on this Question.

Chinese Labour—Regulations for Recruiting.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the recruiting of labour in China for the Transvaal will be carried on by persons responsible to British authority, and how, and by whom, appointed; and what steps will be taken under British authority to ensure that before the labourers leave China they are made fully aware of the wages they are to be paid and the very special restrictions under which their labour is to be performed.

MR. LYTTELTON: The hon. Member will see that Clause 6 of the Ordinance (Cd. 1898) provides that no person shall introduce labourers into the Transvaal except under licence from the Lieutenant-Governor, and I am in communication with Lord Milner as to the manner in which he proposes to secure, under the licensing clause and regulations, control in the matters referred to by the hon. Member and others, connected with the recruiting of these labourers.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): Shall we have the reply of Lord Milner before we debate the subject?

*MR. LYTTELTON: I do not know, Sir.

MR. BUCHANAN: Can the right hon. Gentleman furnish us either with a summary of the debates in the Legislative Council or Lord Milner's reasons for the enormous number of alterations in the Ordinance which have been made during the past week before the House is asked to come to a decision on the question?

*MR. LYTTELTON: The Blue-book contains a full report of the most important stage in the passing of the Ordinance.

MR. BUCHANAN: In a recent Paper it is shown that there are five pages of Amendments telegraphed by Lord Milner, and no reason is given for any of these substantial Amendments.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The earlier stages are set forth in full in the Blue-book for the convenience and study of hon. Members. I cannot give any undertaking that the reports of the proceedings which caused these Amendments should be placed on the Table of the House before the debate.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Essex, Saffron Walden): But cannot the House see the reasons for the alterations which have been made during the past week?

*MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I understand that some of the alterations are of considerable moment. There must have been some despatch from Lord Milner to the Secretary of State explaining the Amendments and giving the reasons why they have been adopted. I do not see how the House can debate the question effectively until it has before it the reasons for accepting these Amendments. Can the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table of the House the despatch of Lord Milner dealing with the Amendments?

*MR. LYTTELTON: I will undertake to lay before the House any Papers dealing with the subject whenever they come before me.

DR. MACNAMARA: Then can we have the debate delayed until we have the full information? I should like an answer to that Question.

Chinese Government and the Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what steps have been taken by him to ascertain the views of the Chinese Government on the regulations with regard to the proposed introduction of indentured Chinese labour into the Transvaal, which, in the despatch of 16th January, he stated His Majesty's Government considered to be necessary before sanctioning the Ordinance.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): His Majesty's Government are in communication with the Chinese Minister in London on the subject.

MR. BUCHANAN: May I ask whether, in view of the statement of the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs and the promise in the despatch of 16th January, the House will not be asked to express its approval of the Ordinance until it learns whether the Chinese Government has given its assent to these provisions, which the Secretary for the Colonies asserted was considered necessary by the Government.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have dealt fully with these points in answer to Questions put to me by the Leader of the Opposition and other hon. Members. [Cries of "No"]

Transvaal Mines—Convict Labour.

MR. WHITLEY (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that at a meeting of the Chamber of Mines, held in Johannesburg on 19th November last, a letter was read from the Transvaal Government offering 1,000 more native convicts for the mines; and, if so, will he state whether this offer was accepted, what is the total number of convicts so employed, what is the nature of the offences for which they have been convicted, and on what terms are they supplied to the mines.

MR. LYTTELTON: I have cabled to make the inquiry, but as yet have received no reply.

MR. WHITLEY: I will put it down again for Monday.

Labour Laws in Australia.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the imprisonment and deportation of British workmen landing in Australia under a contract of labour, why neither the Governor-General nor the Imperial Government made any use of the powers conferred upon them for the protection of British interests by the Commonwealth Act; and whether he will give an undertaking that in future Colonial legislation injuriously affecting the inhabitants of the United Kingdom will be brought to the notice of Parliament before it is assented to by the representatives of the Crown.

*MR. LYTTELTON: Cases of British workmen landing in Australia under contract of labour, other than those specially exempted under the provisions of the Australian Immigration Act, are so few that His Majesty's Government would not have been justified in refusing to sanction an important measure of legislation passed by the Commonwealth Parliament on that account. The measure has been in force for more than two years and not a single case of any British workman having been finally refused permission to land has been brought to notice. It would be impossible to give any general undertaking of the nature referred to.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Did the Governor-General use his power of sending the Bill back for amendment?

*MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir.

Land Settlement in the Transvaal.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will say what sum has been spent on the scheme of land settlement in the Transvaal; how many settlers are in actual occupation of holdings; what is the total acreage so allocated; and how much is in arable cultivation.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The latest information I possess on this subject is dated the 30th June last, and does not give several of the particulars asked for by the hon. Member. I am making inquiry as to the present position and for a Return as to these details.

Trinidad Disturbances.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Chief Justice of British Guiana, who was deputed to inquire into the conduct of the police on the occasion of the disturbances at Port of Spain, Trinidad, in connection with the Water Ordinance, has yet furnished his Report; and, if so, will he state whether it is proposed to grant compensation to the relatives of those who lost their lives.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The answer to the first part of the Question is yes; to the second part, no.

Maltese Council Election.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the text of the Bill introduced in the Council of Malta on 3rd February, purporting to amend the law relating to the election of members of the Council; and whether, in view of the fact that on the same day notice was given that a new general election will shortly be held, he will now publish the correspondence that has taken place.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I am not aware that a Bill was introduced in the Malta Council of Government on the 3rd of February for the purpose stated in the Question. I do not consider that any useful purpose would be served by publishing the correspondence in question at present, and I do not propose to do so.

Railway Embankment between Chiromo and Blantyre.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that a large quantity of the material used in the construction of the embankment of the railway between Chiromo and Blantyre was taken from the banks of the Shiré river, and that, owing to the nature of the material many miles of the embankment were washed away during the wet season; and, if so, will he state if the construction of the railway is under contract, and at how much per mile.

Earl PERCY: I am not aware of the facts alluded to by the hon. Member. The conditions under which the railway in question is being constructed were explained in Africa No. 9 of 1903. (p. 3.)

Mr. WEIR: It was the case not many months ago.

Shipping Profits.

Mr. RUNCIMAN (Dewsbury): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state what were the total amounts of profits on shipping undertakings in the United Kingdom assessed for income tax in 1899–1900, 1900–1901, 1901–2, and 1902–3, respectively.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Worcestershire, E.): I am afraid that it is impossible for me to give the figures asked for. No such classification exists, and I am advised that any attempt to compile one would involve a great deal of trouble and that the results when obtained would not be accurate.

Mr. RUNCIMAN: Would it not be possible to classify the profits of shipping undertakings in the same way as is done with iron works?

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir. I am advised it is not possible to separate the profits on shipping undertakings from those of other undertakings carried on by the same people.

Merchandise Marks Act—Fraudulent Whiskey.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Huntingdonshire, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he has received a copy of a resolution passed at a recent meeting of the Wester Ross Farmers' Club, urging the Government to take measures to stop the practice of describing and selling, as malt whiskey, blends of malt with raw grain or German spirits; and, if so, will he state what action it is proposed to take in the matter.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central): I have been requested by my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture to reply to this Question. I have not seen a copy of the resolution referred to by the hon. Member, but if a complaint that a breach of the Merchandise Marks Acts has been committed, in a specific case, is submitted to me, in accordance with the regulations made under Section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Acts, 1891, I will give it my careful consideration.

Mr. WEIR: Shall I send the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the resolution in order that he may make inquiries if raw grain or German spirit is sold as malt whiskey?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I will give instructions that the hon. Member shall have a copy of the regulations dealing with this matter.

Preferential Rates for Foreign Produce.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the fact that preferential rates are allowed by railway companies to foreign and colonial importers, he will cause inquiry to be made into the matter, and report the result to the House with a view to insure equality of treatment to all consignors.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given him to a similar Question on the 18th June last.† The Board of Trade are prepared to investigate any specific complaints that the law is being infringed as suggested, but they are still without evidence warranting a general inquiry.

† See (4) Debates, cxxiii., 1314.

Canadian Mail Routes.

Mr. CHARLES DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the Canadian Government have appointed a Royal Commission to deal with the subject of transportation; that at the sitting of the Commission held in Sydney, Nova Scotia, during the third week of January last, evidence was produced that a 23-knot steamer could make the passage from Galway to Sydney in three days and fourteen hours; and that an experiment is to be made by means of a fast steamer during the coming summer, between Galway and Sydney or Halifax, with the view of obtaining information as to the best routes for the conveyance of His Majesty's mails over ocean; and, if so, will he state what contracts now exist, with whom and for what period of time, for the conveyance of His Majesty's mails between Great Britain and Ireland and Canada.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Victor Cavendish, Derbyshire, W.)--for Lord Stanley: My right hon. friend has no information of any Commission appointed by the Canadian Government for the purpose to which the hon. Member refers, nor of any experiments to be made during next summer. The only contract which provides for a direct mail service between Great Britain, Ireland and Canada is one made by the Canadian Government with the Allan Line. He believes it has recently been decided to renew that contract for two years from August, 1904.

Avoch Harbour.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state what sum the Fishery Board for Scotland propose to provide in aid of the construction of a harbour at Avoch, Ross-shire.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. A. Graham Murray, Buteshire): I understand that the Fishery Board have intimated to the Avoch Harbour Trustees that all harbour funds at their disposal have been allocated, but that they are willing to consider an application from the Avoch Harbour Trustees if it is renewed in April next.

Scottish Crofters' Act, 1886.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will consider the expediency of introducing legislation to extend the benefits of The Crofters' Act, 1886, to small tenants holding under lease in the crofting counties at the time the Act came into force.

Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I am unable to make any promise of introducing legislation as suggested by the hon. Member.

Bee Keeping in Ireland.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether he is aware that the instructions issued by the Department of Agriculture with respect to bee-keeping do not deal with the compulsory destruction of stocks infected with the disease of foul brood; and, if so, whether, in view of the fact that the honey produced in Ireland during the last year, for which statistics are available was 27 per cent. less than the preceding year the Department will favourably consider further representations with regard to the stamping out of this disease.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): There is no power of compulsory destruction in the scheme. The county instructors appointed under the scheme have not, so far, experienced any difficulty in inducing owners to consent to the destruction of infected stocks when advised that such a course is necessary. The Department are advised that the wet season of 1903 sufficiently accounts for a reduction in the yield of honey in Ireland. The Department are prepared to give careful consideration to any further representations that may be made to them in regard to the disease in question.

Cork Winter Assizes—Alleged Jury Packing.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland if his attention has been called to the proceedings at the Cork Winter Assizes, in December last, when, in the case of a prisoner, Eugene Heffernan, charged with the murder of his mother, thirty jurors were ordered to stand by by the Crown Solicitor; and, if so, will he say whether this action was taken with the sanction of the Irish law officers.

Mr. ATKINSON: The Crown Solicitor, in setting aside twenty-nine, not thirty, jurors in this case, acted in strict accordance with the directions contained in the Circular addressed to Crown Solicitors dealing with such matters, to which I have frequently referred. He was influenced in his action by reliable information which he had received from a respectable juror and from the police, that an effort would be made by the relatives of the accused through their extensive trade connections in the City of Cork to influence the jurors in the prisoner's favour.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland whether he is aware that at the recent Cork Winter Assizes, December, 1903, in connection with the trial of Connor O'Gorman on the charge of fratricide, nineteen jurors were ordered to stand by; and, if so, whether he can state what reasons, if any, were given by the Crown Solicitor for objecting to these men serving on the jury, and also, how many of the nineteen were Roman Catholics.

Mr. ATKINSON: The Crown Solicitor set aside these jurors because he had reasonable grounds for believing that, if sworn, they would not give an impartial verdict. I am not able to give any information as to the religious belief of the jurors set aside.

Mr. FLYNN: Am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that these proceedings have the approval of himself and the law officers of the Crown?

Mr. ATKINSON: Certainly.

Mr. FLYNN: And are we to understand that these jurors in this particular case were not to be believed, that they were perjurers?

Mr. ATKINSON: No, Sir, you are to understand nothing of the sort.

Smerwick Fishing Industry.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps have been taken to meet the wants of the fishermen of Smerwick, county Kerry, with regard to better pier accommodation.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Wyndham, Dover): The Congested Districts Board has already expressed its willingness to contribute towards the cost of this proposed work, if undertaken by the county council. That offer still holds good. There are no funds available from other sources for meeting the cost of the work.

Irish Magistrates and the Irish Language.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can explain under what authority Mr. Thomas McDonogh Mahony, Cahirciveen, county Kerry, has been ordered by the Lord Chancellor not to act as magistrate because he has signed warrants in Irish.

Mr. ATKINSON: At my right hon. friend's request I will reply to this Question. The Lord Chancellor ordered Mr. Thomas McDonogh not to act as a justice because he, in violation of the express provisions of a statute to which his attention had been called, persisted in signing warrants in Irish characters, and refused to give any undertaking to desist from the practice, if permitted to continue to act as a magistrate.

Mr. BOLAND: What is the particular provision?

Mr. ATKINSON: It is in Act 22, Geo. 2, Chap. 6, and it provides that all the business of the Courts in Ireland must be conducted in the English language.

Mr. BOLAND: Will the right hon. Gentleman bring in a Bill to repeal that Act, or favourably consider one if brought in from these Benches?

No answer was audible.

Irish Road Construction Surcharges.

Mr. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that several county and district councils in Ireland have been surcharged by the Local Government Board because of the construction and repair of roads on a width of less than sixteen feet, although, in reply to queries addressed them, the Board have stated that the law is not clear on the matter; and whether, seeing that, owing to the uncertainty existing on this point, and the fear of surcharge, many councils are prevented from repairing old roads on the existing width, and in view of the hardship imposed on communities residing in backward districts, steps will be taken to have it repealed.

Mr. WYNDHAM: It is undoubtedly contrary to the express provisions of the 55th Section of the Grand Jury Act, and, therefore, illegal to construct any new road of a width less than sixteen feet, and any change in the law in that respect would be most objectionable. But there is nothing illegal in the repairing of an old road of less width than sixteen feet, provided it be a public road. Whether a road is a public road or not is a mixed question of law and fact depending on many circumstances. If any county or district councils feel aggrieved by the decision of an auditor they can appeal to the Local Government Board, who are empowered to remit the surcharge on equitable grounds.

Queen's College, Belfast.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the letter written by the President of University College, Dublin, to the Lord-Lieutenant on 11th January last, with reference to the claim of the Belfast Queen's College for additional endowment.

Mr. WYNDHAM: This letter was published in the Press, and it will be laid on the Table, together with the resolutions adopted by the Council and Corporate Body of Queen's College, Belfast, on the 4th December, on the same subject, which were also published and are referred to in the letter from the President of University College.

Military Disturbances at Limerick.

Mr. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that malicious injury claims amounting to £34 are being made against the Corporation of Limerick for the breaking of plate glass windows in that city by soldiers belonging to the Liverpool Regiment; and, whether, seeing that a number of these soldiers were caught in the act, and in view of the burden inflicted on unoffending citizens in having to pay for this destruction, he will propose such Amendment of The Local Government Act, 1898, as will enable these sums to be levied on the property or pay of the offenders.

Mr. WYNDHAM: My attention has been called to the matter referred to. Up to the present the sum claimed in respect of injury shown to have been caused by soldiers is £24, not £34. Soldiers, like other persons who commit such injury, are responsible civilly to the owner for the amount of damage done. There is no special exemption in their case.

Royal Irish Constabulary—Sergeant Williamson's Trial.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that Royal Irish Constabulary courts of inquiry are not open to the Press, and that the Inspector-General published in a Dublin paper a version of the trial of Sergeant Williamson, and refused to the solicitor for the defence copies of the depositions made by the witnesses, he will arrange, before the Royal Irish Constabulary Estimates come up, that the evidence shall be made available for Members; and whether, seeing that the officers who tried the accused were, after their first finding, summoned to the Castle by the Inspector-General, and were interviewed by him there, he will state the details of the findings.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The court of inquiry held in the present case was a Departmental one and the accused, with his legal advisers, was present throughout the proceedings. There is no precedent for publishing a report of the proceedings in the manner suggested, and I see no reason for departing from the customary practice on the present occasion. The officers constituting the Court were not summoned to an interview with the Inspector-General. The accused was found guilty of six charges of fraudulently and deceitfully altering figures in public documents.

Valentia Ferry.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether steps will shortly be taken to carry out the improvements, under the Marine Works (Ireland) Act, at Valentia Ferry, county Kerry; and whether a dredger will be provided to improve the harbours at Kenmare and other ports in the West and South of Ireland.

Mr. WYNDHAM: No decision has yet been reached in reference to the projected works at Valentia. The question of providing a dredger in connection with Irish harbours, to be placed at the disposal of local authorities on loan or hire, is engaging consideration.

Cahirciveen Parish Committee.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Parish Committee scheme for the parish of Cahirciveen, county Kerry, has yet been put into operation; and, if not, can he state the cause of the delay.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The scheme, with the modifications proposed in it, will be considered by the Congested Districts Board at its meeting this week.

Irish District Lunatic Asylums.

Mr. CHARLES DEVLIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Treasury have refused to pay for the maintenance of patients in the district lunatic asylums in Ireland committed under the orders of the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty; that this refusal has been decided upon in defiance of the express words of a statute passed in the first year of the reign of His present Majesty and of a circular issued from the Irish Lunacy Office, Dublin Castle, in the early part of the year 1902; and that the circular referred to was followed by another contradicting it; and, if so, will he state who is responsible for this change; and whether he will take steps to have the law as stated in the Act, and defined by the first circular, carried out.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The earlier of the two circulars was issued in error. The revised circular of May, 1903, was issued by direction of the Irish Government acting upon the advice of the law officers. The latter circular was to the effect that lunatic sailors and soldiers who have committed no crime, but are sent to asylums by the Admiralty or War Office under special statutory authority, are not to be treated as criminal lunatics and, therefore, not to be maintained at the cost of the Exchequer. They are not so maintained in England, and the Government does not think it can be contended they should be in Ireland.

Mr. CHARLES DEVLIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman state by whose advice this circular was issued?

[No answer was returned].

Land Commission in Longford.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when it is proposed to hold another sitting of the Head Land Commission in Longford for the hearing of appeals; and will he, with a view to affecting the payment of the March rents, direct them to hold a sitting before 20th March at latest.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I referred this Question to the Land Commissioners, but so far have not received their observations. Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat the Question to-morrow.

Care of the Insane—Scottish System.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed at a conference of representatives of the Irish District Asylum Committees, on 26th November, in favour of the system of taking family care of persons of unsound mind which is practised on the Continent and Scotland; and, if so, whether he intends to propose any legislation with a view to having the system legalised in Ireland as well as England and Scotland.

MR. WYNDHAM: The resolution has been received, but I cannot give an undertaking that the Government will introduce legislation dealing with the matter during the present session.

Collum's Estate, County Fermanagh.

MR. EDWARD MITCHELL (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether, in view of the fact that the tenants on the estate of Collum, a lunatic in county Fermanagh, proposed to purchase their holdings under the Land Act of 1903, and were referred by the Lord Chancellor to the receiver, Mr. M'Clintock, of Dublin, and that the receiver at once proceeded to serve ejectments on the tenants, he will state if this has been done by the authority of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. WYNDHAM: I am informed that no proposals to purchase have been sent to the receiver by the tenants on this estate.

Labourers (Ireland) Acts.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that in connection with the Land Bill of last year, the Report of Land Commissioner Mr. W. F. Bailey on the working of previous Land Purchase Acts was issued as a Parliamentary Paper, he will, in view of the promised labour legislation, place upon the Table of the House the Reports of the Local Government Board Inspectors on the operations of the existing Labourers Acts.

MR. WYNDHAM: The reports of the Board's Inspectors in respect to the Labourers Acts were made for the private information of the Board to supplement information already in its possession. For this reason, as I have already stated, they cannot be laid on the Table. Mr. Bailey's Report was made at the request of the Lord-Lieutenant, and the same objections did not apply to its publication.

MR. SHEEHAN: But why not follow the precedent of last year, having in view the great importance of this question?

MR. WYNDHAM: Because I say the information gathered was only fragmentary, and intended to supplement that already in the hands of the Local Government Board.

Irish Local Government Auditors—Qualifications.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what is the standard of qualification for appointment as Local Government Auditor; whether any examination is necessary, or whether the appointment is merely by nomination; and will he grant a Return showing the number and qualification of gentlemen appointed to this position since 1st April, 1899.

MR. WYNDHAM: Auditors, before entering upon their duties, must satisfy the Civil Service Commissioners in respect to their qualifications, which are determined by an examination in prescribed subjects. I am sending to the hon. Member a Return containing the information mentioned in the second part of the Question.

Strabane Gas Works Loan.

MR. HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience caused by the delay of the Treasury in giving a decision as to granting a loan of £15,000 to the Strabane Urban District Council for the construction of gas works in the town of Strabane, which loan has been duly sanctioned by the Board of Works in Ireland so far back as the month of August last year, and brought under the notice of the Treasury; and whether he will take steps to have the recommendations of the Board of Works carried into effect, so as to enable the urban district council to proceed with the construction of the gas works.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: This loan was submitted by the Board of Works for Treasury sanction on the 9th November last. The Treasury hesitated to sanction it because the figures given on behalf of the urban district council appeared to make it doubtful whether the proposal was financially a sound one from the council's point of view. It has therefore been thought necessary to refer the matter back to the council, through the Board of Works, in order that they may clearly understand the financial effect, and may then decide, after further consideration, whether they wish to proceed with the loan.

Longford Postal Arrangements.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether, in order to facilitate the earlier delivery of letters and parcels in Longford, he will direct that the auxiliary postmen for that purpose be placed upon the permanent staff of town letter carriers.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH (for Lord STANLEY): My right hon. friend will have inquiry made on the subject.

SELECTION (UNOPPOSED BILL COMMITTEES) (PANEL).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection that they had selected the following eight Members to be the Panel to serve on Unopposed Bill Committees under Standing Order No. 109:—Mr. Brynmor Jones, Mr. Carvill, Mr. H. D. Greene, Mr. Heywood Johnstone, Mr. Mellor, Mr. Paulton, Mr. Parker Smith, and Mr. Worsley-Taylor.

Report to lie upon the Table.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES) (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee that they had selected the following six Members to be the Chairmen's Panel and to serve as Chairmen of the two Standing Committees to be appointed under Standing Order No. 49:—Mr. John Ellis, Sir Thomas Esmunde, Sir James Fergusson, Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice, Mr. Laurence Hardy, and Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

Report to lie upon the Table.

NEW BILL.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS (FUNDS) BILL.

"To authorise the appropriation of the surplus Funds derived from Battersea Park towards the opening of the Mall into Charing Cross, and other Metropolitan improvements," presented by Mr. Victor Cavendish; supported by Lord Balcarres; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 55.]

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

[EIGHTH DAY.]

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

Which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words 'But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being.'"—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) said that when the debate was interrupted last night he was referring to the question of wages which had been raised by an hon. Member opposite, who had urged that the position of England in Europe was assured so far as its wealth and prosperity was concerned, as was evidenced by our standards of wages, living, and comfort. Now he would be the last to say that those standards were not high in this country. No doubt they were higher than in any other countries—except new countries which had exceptional advantages, such as the United States and our own Colonies. But there was one statement of the hon. Member he must deal with. It was that the wages of certain skilled workmen, which in 1860 were 28s. 3d., had risen to 37s. 9d. by 1890. That, no doubt, was a remarkable increase, but he wished to point out that the increase in Germany of the same period was appreciably greater, starting from a lower standard. Was it strange that the standard should have been lower in this country? These were the days when Cobden had given this country a new and great policy, we were in an extraordinary position in the matter of our manufactures, and not in a serious position in the matter of our agriculture. Cobden then looked forward to the time when England would permanently command the manufactures of the world, for he held that the repeal of the Corn Laws would not only give a great impulse to our manufactures, but would inflict so severe a shock on our rivals by giving us augmented opportunities of competition all over the world, that England would permanently maintain her position against Germany, France, and the United States. Those who held the opinion that free trade was not an unmixed blessing at all times and places had been again and again challenged because it had been said that the protectionist in America sold cheap abroad in order that he might sell dear at home. But he would like to point to the fact that America manufactured goods from raw material which she did not produce, and sold them just as cheap at home as abroad. Since 1824 there had been a tax on wool in the United States, which she had always had to import from Australia, South America, or elsewhere. Could any one suggest that the wages of workmen in the United States were low because the manufacturer sold his goods cheap abroad so as to sell dear at home? Take the case of tweeds. Why the United States, where twenty-five years ago there was no good American tweed, and only American shoddy was worn, now produced, in spite of the heavy tax on wool, tweed clothes as good and as cheap and as well made as any we produced in this country, and they were worn by 75 per cent. of the population of the States, while the workman engaged in making them got twice as much wages as the workman in this country. That seemed absurd on the face of it, but it sufficed to point out the moral he wished to be drawn from his remarks. The American workman, to begin with, was working in an area where he was absolutely secure, and the manufacturer commanded his home market. No doubt the United States had great resources in her own borders which we did not possess. We had to go abroad to purchase food, a portion of which we might still be able to produce if the policy of free trade had not pressed so heavily on the agriculture of the country. The United States had never exported so heavily as we had, neither had she imported as heavily. Her imports were £171,000,000, whilst the imports of England were £528,000,000, and her exports were £304,000,000 against our £347,000,000. But it was not reasonable to suggest that because the United States did not export so much she was necessarily poorer. The fact that her imports and exports were so well balanced showed that she was commanding her home trade. Was American-made furniture sold cheaper in England than in America?

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Certainly.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: I beg your pardon.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg yours.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: Were American shoes dearer in England than in America?

MR. FLAVIN: Certainly.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he had studied the question.

MR. FLAVIN: And so have I.

SIR GILBERT PARKER: And my conclusion is that they are not.

MR. FLAVIN: I have worn the boots and paid for them, so I know they are.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he had done the same. The point he wished to make was that the margin of difference was not sufficient to justify the assertion that protectionist countries sold cheap abroad in order to sell dear at home. What was the policy of Mr. Carnegie and his fellow manufacturers? Did they dump simply in order to get rid of their surplus stock—did they desire merely to make England a Cheap-jack market? No, the policy of Mr. Carnegie and the other manufacturers was first to secure the home market and to use it as a leverage by which to capture fureign markets. They kept their works going for nine months in the year in order to supply the home market, and then, instead of incurring a loss by closing for the remaining three months, and keeping their men and factories idle, they kept them running by selling the goods produced at cost price abroad. They did not sell goods cheap simply to capture the English market. They had another purpose in view. It was not the trades unions who alone secured high wages for the working men in the United States; it was the fact that the manufacturers had a settled policy, by the quantity of production, to keep their workmen employed all the year round. By the policy they adopted of selling here at cost, they were able to reduce the expenses of their establishments and to avoid the loss which would be entailed by the temporary shutting down of the works. It was not done for philanthropic motives, but it was done in order to secure regular employment for the men all the year round, and the effect on the domestic and on national life, as well as on the manufacturers themselves, was very great and good. It produced confidence and security. Let them remember that if the cart of progress was to be drawn along, and if the capital which should draw it went lame, labour alone would not draw the cart. It was the command of their home markets that ensured employment and increased wages for the working classes in the United States, and which at the same time secured the manufacturers in their position. How did we stand in the matter of our home trade? Were we satisfied that we had the absolute command of it? When he read the table of our imports and exports he could not say that the prospect was, by any means, a cheery one, He would give a few trades in which there had been a rise in imports and a fall in exports. During the last nine years the figures for the increase of imports and the decrease of exports respectively were, in the boot and shoe trade, £2,159,000 and £920,000; in woollens, £18,000,000 and £38,000,000; in furniture, £5,500,000 and £600,000; in earthenware, £2,400,000 and £15,000,000; in glass, £11,700 and £1,300,000, and in silk, £38,000,000 and £8,000,000. That was a serious state of affairs, and it was certainly not what Cobden had anticipated. Cobden looked forward to seeing the manufacturers of England commanding the trade, not only of this country, but of all others. We, however, did not expect that, as we knew perfectly well that the discovery of the great mineral resources of the United States and the Colonies had altered the course of trade with those countries. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was not the first to raise this question of the decline of British exports and the increase of British imports. Lord Rosebery raised it on the basis that if we went on—the signs were so alarming—we were bound steadily to decrease in power as a manufacturing nation. If was true that merchanting was increasing every day in this country, but manufacturing was proportionately decreasing. Moreover, our carrying trade, whilst it had increased, was slowly being competed with by Germany, and if the United States made up its mind to enter the theatre of shipping, we should probably have a bad time in the future. He altogether disputed the theory, suggested by the Cobden Club, that the fact that the amount of American shipping was insignificant as compared with British shipping was a sign of a lack of American prosperity. Why did not Americans invest in shipping? Because it was much more to their benefit to put their money into "industrials," which yielded a return of 15 or 20 per cent., than into shipping, which would bring them in 5, 7, or possibly, in some cases, 10 per cent. We, for our £528,000,000 of imports, were content to send out one-third of the amount of exports, and for the rest to pay by shipping alone. He did not suggest that England's position would be better if we had less shipping; on the contrary, he considered it to be absolutely necessary to England's future that her position in the carrying trade should be maintained. He did, however, wish to point out that thirty years ago we had the same position in the carrying trade and a better position in the manufacturing world. We had lost, on the one hand, and we had not gained proportionately on the other.

Having been challenged on the question of colonial enthusiasm in the matter of preference, and as to the offer of the Colonies, he had looked the matter up in The Times, and he found there had not been a single dissentient voice from the Colonies or from any public body in the Colonies. On the contrary, every Legislature in the Colonies had expressed its sympathy with the belief in the idea of preference. The New Zealand Parliament had passed a Bill on the subject. Not only had the Premier of Australia spoken in favour of the proposal, but the Leader of the Opposition in Australia, whose form of preference might differ from that of his political opponent, had said again and again—

> "I propose to reduce the taxes upon British goods by 50 per cent. Whatever Sir E. Barton will do, I will do more."

SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS: But he is a free-trader.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said the fact that Mr. Reid was a free-trader was a striking tribute to the argument he was addressing to the House. Sir Wilfrid Laurier also was a free-trader.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester) asked whether Mr. Reid asked for anything in return.

SIR GILBERT PARKER said he had expected that question. Mr. Reid asked for nothing in return. Moreover, he had looked the matter up in the Canadian papers, and he unhesitatingly asserted that the Leader of the Opposition in Canada had so far coincided with the opinion and the action of the Canadian Government that again and again he had spoken in favour of preference. As to the question of his hon. friend, who did not know the exigencies of politics, even in this country? It was extraordinary that this movement should have met with so little opposition in the Colonies when one considered how eager opposing Parties were to dish each other. They were told that a preference could be given to Australia only on wool. That was inaccurate. A preference on wool was not our last resort. By giving a preference on agriculture, on meat and wines, we should benefit Australia more than by a preference on wool, because although the meat and wine trade was not worth more than 60 per cent. of the pastoral trade, it employed 50 per cent. more hands, and thus affected the working classes to a greater extent.

His interest and belief in this scheme had led him to speak at greater length than he had intended. In conclusion, he could only say that he believed the future of this country depended upon a closer association and a common destiny with our Colonies. He felt that we could never retrieve the place we had lost in the industrial movement of Europe, but we could secure our position by a closer alliance with those nations which had supplied our trade, as it had declined with foreign countries. He believed that sooner or later preference would come, and so would a 10 or 20 per cent. tax upon foreign manufactured goods, in order to protect that trade which has been, and will be, for the prosperity of this country.

SIR JOHN GORST (Cambridge University): The hon. Member for Gravesend, who has just made an interesting and instructive speech, is, I presume, an opponent of His Majesty's Government, because he spent one part of his speech in advocating protection, and the other in advocating colonial preference, which are both policies that the Government have distinctly renounced. When the House adjourned last night, the hon. Member was trying to show that the German workman was much better off than the English workman, although I do not think that is very relevant to the question before the House. The hon. Member has omitted that part of his argument this morning. With the official policy and declarations of the Government I, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, am entirely in accord. We understood the President of the Board of Trade to say that a tax upon food was not within the sphere of practical politics, that the Government are opposed to colonial preference and general protection, and a 10 per cent. all-round tariff, and that their policy upon fiscal reform is freedom to negotiate, followed by retaliation if it obtains the approval and assent of Parliament. That is substantially the same as the statement made by the Prime Minister at Sheffield. It may have been a little more clearly put, but it was practically the official policy laid down at Sheffield, from which the Leader of the House has not departed in subsequent speeches. The President of the Board of Trade gave a very interesting psychological fact, which I think accounts a great deal for what has happened since. It appears that every member of the Government has got, like Faust, two souls, one is the official soul, which is retaliatory, and the other is a private, personal soul, which, in the case of most of the members of the Government is protectionist, though in one or two cases it is free-trade. This appears to account for all the vagaries which have taken place. It was the private and personal soul of the Prime Minister that prompted him to declare at Sheffield that he was in favour of reversing the fiscal policy of the last fifty years, a statement which drove the Duke of Devonshire out of the Cabinet. It was the same private and personal soul that prompted the President of the Board of Trade, on Tuesday last, to interrupt an hon. Member on this side of the House and tell the House that he wished it were possible to tax food.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central) was understood to deny this statement.

Sir John Gorst.

SIR JOHN GORST: It is quite clear that it was his protectionist soul that drove my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board to make speeches against those who were the supporters of the official policy of the Government. I gather from the speech of the President of the Local Government Board, which did not contradict the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, that this official policy will be maintained until after the division has taken place. The Secretary to the Board of Trade made a strong protectionist speech, but, with great ingenuity, it was not in favour of protection, but pointed out the most effective way of retaliating, and it was a good object lesson as to how a policy of retaliation may very quickly, under certain circumstances, develop itself into a policy of protection. Although this official policy of the Government is perfectly satisfactory, there is one singular circumstance about it, and it is that none of the members of the Government outside the House of Commons support the official policy at all. Some of us try to support the official policy of the Government by showing that colonial preference is undesirable, and by attacking the system of protection, but we meet with no encouragement of any kind from the Government. I want to ask a perfectly clear and definite question of the Government, which I think they might reply to on the spot. I want to know whether hereafter those who oppose the official policy of the Government, like the hon. Member who has just sat down, who go in for protection and colonial preference, will receive the official countenance and support of Cabinet Ministers in their candidature, to the exclusion of those who really and honestly support the official policy of the Government. [OPPOSITION cries of "Answer, answer."] That is a very simple question. I am a Tory of 1866, and during all my Parliamentary career I have served under the leaders who have been free-traders—the late Mr. Disraeli, Sir Stafford Northcote, the late Marquess of Salisbury, and even the present Prime Minister, who has told us over and over again that he is a convinced free-trader. All the chiefs under whom I have served are staunch free-traders—

Lord Cross, Lord Goschen, and the Duke of Devonshire, all of them still alive. To my noble friend I would counsel patience until this tyranny be past, and I hope he will live to be the head of the united Tory Party, with sound fiscal principles.

It would be almost indecent for me to sit down without saying a few words in support of that official policy which was announced from the Treasury Bench. I understand that the Government are officially opposed to colonial preference. I think in the interests of one of the greatest possessions of the British Empire, the Empire of India, they are wise. This has been overlooked in the agitation out-of-doors, although it was mentioned by the late Secretary of State for India, and it is one which deserves the attention of both sides of this House before the fiscal question is finally settled, because India contains 300,000,000 of inhabitants who are subjects of the British Empire. Consequently India, is next to Great Britain, the greatest free market in the world. Now, the Government of India have the advantage of having—I was going to say no Parliament, but that would be scarcely respectful to this Assembly. They have the advantage of having the complete command of the services of the very greatest experts and the most experienced commercial politicians which the Government of the great Indian Empire provides. They have been advised that these colonial preferences could do little good and might do great harm to the interests of the Indian Empire. The Indian Empire has not very much to offer in the way of preference to us, and it has hardly anything which it can gain from us in return. That is the advice of the experts, and it is adopted unanimously by the Government of India. I will not trouble the House with the details of the reasons, so admirably given in a despatch, for the Government of India coming to that conclusion. But there is one danger which that Government have to fear from the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to which I should like to be allowed to direct attention, because it is an admirable illustration of the extraordinary complexity of commercial relations, and I think it is a very good illustration of how people might do an immense amount of harm to commercial relations without ever dreaming that they were doing any mischief at all. It shows how an ignorant—I do not wish to use the word in a bad sense—it shows how an uninformed Government might put its hand into the delicate machine of commercial relations and do mischief they never thought of.

This is how the difficulty arises. India is a debtor country. It has to pay a sum of £16,000,000 per annum to Great Britain for services rendered—Army charges, stores, the diplomatic services in Persia and China, and so on; and there is the large sum that comes home as interest on the immense amount of British capital invested in India railways. They do not pay in direct exports to this country, because the trade of India is such that India takes from the United Kingdom £35,000,000 worth of our exports, which are chiefly manufactures, and we take only £21,000,000 worth of her exports, which are chiefly raw materials, articles of food and tea, so that you see, instead of there being any direct surplus of exports to Great Britain it is the other way, and the trade with Great Britain enhances the amount somehow or other she has to pay back to Great Britain. Well, how does she pay it back? She pays it through British possessions from which the imports into India are £5,000,000, while the exports are £11,000,000, and through foreign countries from which the imports into India are £12,500,000, and to which the exports from India amount to the enormous sum of £51,500,000. It is through these exports to foreign countries that India pays her £16,000,000 of debt, and the difference between imports and exports between her and Great Britain. Of course, the way in which this takes place is enormously complicated, as people may suppose, but I give the House two illustrations which will show the sort of way in which these payments take place. Of raw cotton—there is a good deal of cotton grown in India—£8,000,000 worth are exported from India. Hardly any of it comes direct to this country. Raw cotton imported by us from India only represents £370,000. We get nearly all our cotton from America. But there is a very large export of Indian cotton to Continental countries. Germany takes £1,250,000 worth, France £480,000, Italy £807,000, and Belgium £1,856,000. In fact most of the Indian cotton, except what goes to Japan, goes to the Continental countries of Europe. This cotton is worked up by the cotton mills of France, Germany, and Belgium, and finds its way into the English market as cotton manufactures, and these are amongst the articles which the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham denounce as imports that ought to be stopped by a large import duty. India is an enormous exporter of all kinds of seeds, and amongst others of linseed. She exports altogether as much as £3,500,000 worth of seeds. We take a very good proportion of them ourselves, but £593,000 worth go to France, and £809,000 worth go to Germany. In France and Germany this linseed is made into linseed oil. There are great oil presses in Marseilles, Bremen, and Hamburg. Somehow or other the French and the Germans have superior processes of pressing, and can, therefore, supply our market with linseed oil which is cheaper and better than that we make at home. At any rate we do a large trade in linseed oil with the Continent. Partly, therefore, the sum which India must transmit to this country arrives in this way in the shape of cotton manufactures and linseed oil. I have no doubt the great Commission now sitting will severely tax these products if they can. That is a danger the Indian Government look forward to. Here they see that a small protective tariff might have a most pernicious effect on the trade of India without anybody intending it at all. I do not doubt that India would have ot find some other mode of making the transmission, but this way in which it is done is the easiest way. If you disturb this, India will have to find some other way, and she cannot find so good and cheap a way. The disturbance of this particular form of trade will put an additional burden on the already overburdened people of India. It would be a distinct disadvantage to the trade and commerce of the Indian Empire.

While I am talking about India, may I revert to what I said a moment ago, that India is the greatest open market next to Great Britain in the world, and I say you could not possibly have any better test of the respective merits of protection and free trade for the protection and promotion of foreign trade, than the way in which the different nations of the world appear in the Indian market. In the despatch to which I have referred, there is an appendix which contains a short epitome of the Paper presented to Parliament on the trade of India, and I commend this little epitome to the most earnest attention of Members on both sides of the House, and especially to Members for Lancashire constituencies. I may mention that this appendix contains a statement of the amounts of the various articles imported into India from all the different countries in the world. I shall only trouble the House with one item, and that is cotton. In India they import altogether £1,658,000 worth of cotton yarn. How much of this is from spinners in Great Britain? Of that amount, £1,575,000 worth is from Great Britain, and from the whole of the Continent of Europe and the United States there only comes £73,000 worth. In the cotton manufactures exactly the same tale is told. Of cotton manufactures they import into India £18,323,000 worth, and of these there comes from the cotton manufacturers of Great Britain in competition with the whole world—because the whole world is in the Indian market—£17,525,000 worth. The whole of the Continent and the United States, and all our competitors put together, only supply £740,000 worth. These figures will not add up, but the difference is accounted for by the fact that I have left out a little margin which is imported from British possessions, such as Singapore and Hong-Kong. Who comes next to us? Why, Italy comes next with £143,000. The United States, the terrible competitors we are so much afraid of, import £81,000 of cotton manufactures and Germany £106,000. With figures like this before you, is it not true to say that the British manufacturer practically commands the entire market, and that no other manufacturer is in it at all? And why do you command the market? You ask some of the Lancashire mill-owners. Let the hon. Member for Stalybridge ask some of his constituents why it is that they beat every nation in the world. It is because this is a free-trade country. The manufacturer can build his mill with untaxed materials, he can fill it with untaxed machinery, and he can get every one of those articles which are necessary for the manufacture of cotton in the cheapest market. He can buy his cotton in America, Egypt, and numerous other places, and every requisite for his manufacture in the cheapest market, and, therefore, he is able to undersell the American and German manufacturer whose Governments do not give him the privilege which the British manufacturer enjoys. It is said that we ought to rejoice in the prospect of lowering foreign tariffs. I wish that that prophecy might be fulfilled, but I do not think the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire would rejoice at that which would be no doubt beneficial to the world in general, for they would then lose the practical monopoly which I say they now enjoy of the Indian market, because Great Britain has been, and still is, a free-trade country. Let me recommend that argument to the consideration of the hon. Member for Stalybridge.

There is one other danger sketched out in the despatch of the Indian Government. What would happen if India itself were a protectionist country? Hitherto we have been able to maintain in India free trade, but the noble Lord the Member for Ealing said in his speech that representations were being continually made for protection in India. I know that such applications were frequently made when Lord Cross and I were at the India Office. How were these representations met? The noble Lord told us that he said —

> "We have convinced ourselves that the policy of free trade is best for the inhabitants of this country, and we are giving to the population of India the same benefits that we ourselves enjoy. But supposing India became protectionist, what could you then say to the Indian manufacturers who want protection for their native goods? How could you refuse to them the protection you are giving to the manufacturers at home."

You would not be able to maintain the present free-trade policy in India for a month. You would have a tax placed at once on your importations of cotton. Where then would your Lancashire trade be? Think of the enormous population in our Lancashire towns which is really manufacturing for the Indian market; and just think of the distress and confusion that would be entailed by a policy which deprives them of that market. I will not make a peroration, but I have thrown out some facts and arguments which the opponents of the Government ought to take into consideration before they press on the Government a change of their official policy. The silence of the President of the Board of Trade greatly alarms me. I do not know where I stand. I do not know whether the Government are really pleased at our support of their official commercial policy; but because I believe it is the best for the interests of the people of this country I shall continue to support it—even at the risk of displeasing His Majesty's Government. I promise to oppose in this House any attempt either to establish any colonial preference or to establish in this country a general protective system.

*MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): My right hon. friend below me has dealt in some detail with some proposals for fiscal reform, so far as they are likely to affect the Government of India and that country. He is alarmed, he tells us, at the silence of the President of the Board of Trade on this subject. Not having had the advantage, like my right hon. friend, of having been in the India Office myself, I think it would be more respectful to him if I leave it to some member of the Government or one familiar with the affairs of India to deal with that branch of the subject. I propose to go to the Amendment which is immediately before the House. My right hon. friend the Member for Croydon told the House yesterday afternoon that there was nothing in that Amendment from which he was able to dissent, or of which he could not approve. I am sorry to say that, differing entirely from my right hon. friend in that respect, I think there is very little in that Amendment that I am able to support. I have taken great interest in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who moved it; and I have followed with all the care and attention I have been able to give to them the various speeches which have succeeded, but I am bound to say—and I hope I say it without any offence—that I have been able to find very little in any of them either to support or establish the three main propositions which that Amendment contains. And, with the permission of the House, I desire for a few moments to examine them and to say a few words on each. What is the first proposition? It is as follows—

> "That our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers."

Conflicting declarations upon what? I presume upon the official or fiscal policies which are now before us. But the Government have expressly and repeatedly declared that there will be, and that there can be, no change in our fiscal policy during the present Parliament. And how conflicting declarations upon some future fiscal policy which may or may never come before the country [OPPOSITION laughter]—although I have very little doubt that it will, and with results which probably hon. Gentlemen opposite may not find altogether pleasant—how on earth conflicting declarations on a matter affecting another Parliament is to "impair our deliberations on the financial service of the present year," I confess I do not understand. It is not clear to me. I pass from that, which, after all, is a comparatively small matter, to the second proposition, and what is that?—

> "That the removal of protective duties has, for more than half a century, actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population."

Now, I venture to think that in that statement the right hon. Gentleman goes somewhat too far. If he had been content to say that for many years after the adoption of free trade, perhaps for a quarter of a century, that policy had been followed by these results, then I do not know that I should have had anything to say in dispute of that proposition, because undoubtedly it is the case. I make the admission; I have never questioned for a moment that for many years after the adoption of free trade there was a very remarkable and unexampled development of prosperity in the country. Those who were its authors, or at least most of them, have always been in the habit of putting that down to the credit of free trade. With great respect, there again I think they go too far and that, to a certain extent, they are mistaken, because there were a vast number of causes at that time which contributed to that development of our industries, and that great prosperity. Although I admit that undoubtedly free trade played a part, and probably an important part, in that development, I doubt very much if other causes did not play an infinitely greater part. There were all the great inventions of that time: steam, the telegraph, and other scientific discoveries. Railroads everywhere were being created, steamboats were being built, and the means of transport were being increased every year. Then there were the immense discoveries of gold in California, and later in Australia—the most fertilising agency in the world, as it has been described—causing a great expansion of the currency—a period of rising prices—giving the greatest stimulus to enterprise which the world has probably ever known. All these things, in my humble opinion, contributed to the great development and prosperity of those years in a greater degree than even free trade itself. At that time, it should also be remembered, in this country we had the start of all other nations. We had lived for many years at that time under a system of rigid protection. Our great manufactories had already been established and thoroughly equipped, which was not the case with others. I am speaking of facts which are known to everyone who has studied history. The consequence was that we were, at that time, in a position to take the fullest advantage of all those adventitious circumstances, which was not the case with other nations. We were called at that time, and rightly called, the workshop of the world. In those days we supplied foreign nations with almost everything they required; and in return we bought their food and supplies of provisions for ourselves. Cobden, no doubt, at that time thought his expectations had been realised in a greater degree than ever he had hoped for himself, and for aught I know he believed, and he had some reason for believing, that in all probability we should continue selling cotton and buying corn for an indefinite number of years to come.

Mr. Chaplin.

But after a time there came a complete change in this respect, and it arose in this way. Foreign nations became tired of always depending on us for everything in the way of manufactured goods they required, and they determined to establish workshops of their own. How did they set about it? The first thing they did was to resort to our own discarded weapon of protection as the most potent instrument they could use for the purposes of the great object they had in view. Of course we are all familiar with the statements Cobden made at that time about foreign countries all being ready to follow our example. I desire to speak with the utmost respect in every way of Cobden. He was not only a great man, but I am sure he was a perfectly sincere man, and that all he prophesied again and again on this subject he most thoroughly and absolutely believed in himself. All we say against him is that he was mistaken on this point. No man in the world could have been more completely mistaken than he was. I will not repeat his prophecies, because every one knows them. He thought at first that the moment we adopted the principle of free trade all other countries in the world would hasten to follow our example; and, if Cobden had been right, we should have arrived undoubtedly and beyond all question at the ideal which, I suppose, each of us would set before himself—certainly I for one have never wavered in that opinion—namely free exchange. But, unfortunately, Cobden in all his predictions on this point turned out to be absolutely wrong. Exactly the opposite has happened. What we have seen, for many years, is this: foreign nations, one after the other, adopting a system of protection. As a matter of fact, I believe we are the only great country left in the world which still adheres to a system of free trade; but we have not got, and never have had free trade or anything whatever approaching it. That is why I have always been careful never to pronounce myself, as I have heard so many Gentlemen in all parts of the House pronounce themselves, "a convinced free-trader," and for this simple and sufficient reason: we have not got and we have never had free trade, and there is not a single man, in my generation at all events, who is able to speak from any practical knowledge or experience of the merits, or otherwise, of that system. On the contrary, not only have other countries one and all resorted to protection, but they have adopted that system with results which in recent years are most remarkable, and of which Cobden himself never dreamt for a single moment.

Some Gentlemen in this House profess to see no cause for alarm or anxiety or disquietude in connection with the present position of our trade. They think that the Board of Trade Returns and the Blue-book which has been published absolutely demolish the case which has been put forward for fiscal reform. So far as I understand him, the Leader of the Opposition is one of them. But there are other members of his Party who do not agree with him. Only on Monday, the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment spoke of the conditions of our employment and of our trade as being such as to give cause for the gravest reflection. Another leading statesman belonging to the Party opposite made, some years ago, so striking and so remarkable a statement on this branch of the subject that I make no apology for quoting it to the House. In 1896 he told the country that year after year our Consuls and the Board of Trade warned us that we were no longer, as we once were, the undisputed mistress of the world of commerce, but that we were threatened by one formidable rival at any rate. "I mean Germany," he said. Then he pointed out that our imports of manufactured goods from Germany rose from £16,000,000 in 1883 to £21,000,000 in 1893, or an increase of 30 per cent. in ten years, and that into a country which believed it had the monopoly of supplying the world with manufactured goods. Then he went on to say "In some of our Colonies, India and Egypt, German trade had gravely menaced British trade," and, finally, he added, "Surely an inquiry might be instituted, short, practical, and exhaustive into the cause of the decline of British trade and the alarming increase of our foreign rivals." "Germany," he concluded "is engaged in an industrial war with us, and in that, I think, unless we take precautions in time, she is not unlikely to succeed." Who was the statesman who made these observations? He is the statesman who, I understand, is the latest ally of the Leader of the Opposition. I mean Lord Rosebery. That was Lord Rosebery's case in 1896. That is my case, only more so now. The experience of the years that have elapsed since then have confirmed it, and with every word Lord Rosebery said at that time, I most entirely agree. Let me support Lord Rosebery's view by a single statement from the Blue-book. I could give many, but one is sufficient. It shows two things at all events; but I am bound to say that it seems to me that the students of the Blue-book book on the other side, as far as can be judged by their speeches, have been very careful to overlook it. It shows firstly, that one of the cardinal doctrines of the Cobden Club that protection is necessarily fatal to successful competition in any industrial country, a statement endorsed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon last night, is absolutely demolished by the test of actual experience. It shows, secondly, that whereas our commercial supremacy was originally achieved under what hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite call, and what the mover of the Amendment called, "the impoverishing system of protection," we are beginning to lose that commercial supremacy under a system of free trade.

I listened to the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary of the Board of Trade on Tuesday, and I desire to take this opportunity of expressing to him my most sincere congratulations on the very remarkable speech he delivered, by which he held a crowded House in rapt attention for over an hour. Like him, I desire to take, as an illustration to support my view, the Iron and Steel Trade. There is, and can be, nothing more important. Moreover, that trade is one in which, until a few years ago, we stood alone, in which we were unapproached and absolutely without a rival in the world. If hon. Gentlemen will try it by the test which is recommended in the Blue-book, what they will find is this. I take the year 1879 for this reason, because it was the year in which Bismarck abandoned free trade and resorted to protection. Hon. Gentlemen would find that the consumption of pig-iron, which is the best test of all, because all iron and steel manufactures have to pass through that stage, in 1879 in Germany was 2,216,000 tons, and in England, 6,000,000 tons. But in 1902, whereas England had increased to 8·7 million tons, Germany had increased to 8,403,000 tons. In other words this country, with a start which was immense, increased only 2,000,000 tons, whereas Germany in the same period increased 6,000,000 tons. But that is nothing to America, which, during the same time, increased her production of pig-iron from 2,700,000 tons to 17,000,000 tons; i.e., an increase of 15,000,000 tons, while we had increased 2,000,000 only. I do not, however, rest my case upon America, because her natural resources are so great. Her area is so vast, and her coal and iron are often so much nearer the service than ours and so much easier to obtain. But I am not aware that Germany has any similar advantages over this country, and yet this is the result which we see under the system of protection, in the only country left that adheres to the system of free imports. We are caught and beaten by one of our protectionist rivals and outdistanced altogether by the other; and that in one of the chief and leading industries in the country. Where is this to stop? Is there no feeling of uncertainty and anxiety in this matter in the minds of hon. Members opposite. It is steel and iron to-day. It will be one of the other great industries to-morrow. I ask, with great earnestness, hon. Members of this House to consider is this a satisfactory condition of affairs?

I have only given one instance out of the many I could give because I did not wish to detain the House. Are we to sit still and do nothing, which I take to be the policy of the Opposition, in the face of these remarkable circumstances and facts which we see to-day, or are we to be moving? There is nothing in the world which surprises me so much, after giving credit to hon. Gentlemen opposite for having investigated and stated their case, as to see with what comparative indifference they regard it, and how little they seem to recognise the enormous change in the general position during the last twenty years, and the great necessity for doing something, at all events, to try and deal with the situation before it is too late. If it is to be met at all what is the remedy for it? Lord Rosebery, who does, or did appear to be alive to the gravity of the situation in 1896, thought he found both the cause and the remedy as well; though I think he was inaccurate, for in the course of the same speech he said—

> "The cause is not far to seek, for the last sixty, seventy, or eighty years Germany has fitted herself by a most perfect system of technical education to be a great industrial nation."

Nobody values the benefits of education more than I do, but when did this alarming increase begin? I beg hon. Members to consider this; curiously enough it was not until Prince Bismarck abandoned free trade and adopted the policy of protection and supplemented the advantages of education most effectually by securing for German manufacturers the undisturbed possession of their own markets. And if it was due to education alone, will any hon. or right hon. Gentleman explain to us how it is that this system of perfect education, having been in force for sixty, seventy, or eighty years, according to Lord Rosebery, did nothing to increase the prosperity of our rivals until they commenced to live under a system of protection. Let me say with regard to education, whatever may be its undoubted merits, that to suppose it is a remedy in itself is the greatest delusion in the world. Supposing it enabled you to produce your goods better and more cheaply than you ever did before; everyone knows perfectly well that the duties would be immediately raised, and your position would be worse than ever.

Now I pass from that to another branch of the subject. Others tell us, the Member for Fife, I believe, is one, that the fault lies with our manufacturers and workmen—want of enterprise in the one, of skill and industry in the other. I do not believe it, and until the contrary is proved I regard it as a libel upon both. No; there is another and a better reason for it. I have talked to men of business by the score and they all agree in this. That for succesful competition in trade, security for capital and the most effective means for cheap production are essential. Our rivals find security for capital in the possession of their home market, which is practically, to all intents and purposes, kept for them. And the secret of cheap production is large production. But for large production the first essential is that you shall have the largest possible market always open and assured to you. How do we stand in that respect as compared with our foreign rivals. They have always two markets open to them, their own, which is protected, and the market of this country, which is always open to the world, where they can compete with our own manufacturers and workmen to any extent they please. On the other hand, we have only what is left to us of our own markets by our rivals, the neutral markets of the world which are trifling, and the markets of the Colonies. It is in these industrial conditions, I am convinced, that the explanation will be found that while foreign countries under a system of protection have been increasing their production by leaps and bounds, we are caught and beaten in the race for trade, and unless some other steps are taken to avert it, we shall be beaten still worse in the future. What, then, is the remedy? There are three policies before us. One is the policy of the Opposition, which is to do nothing; the second is the policy of retaliation, which is the policy of the Government, and which, so far as it goes, is good, but it fails in two respects. It will not recover for you the markets you have lost, nor will it help you in others which are absolutely necessary to the workers of this country. Secondly, if it means anything, it means, according to the President of the Board of Trade, that in certain conditions duties will be imposed on manufactured goods. Now I remember perfectly well Mr. Gladstone's opinion on this point. He declared that nothing on earth would ever induce him to agree to protection upon manufacturers unless agriculture was included. Well, then! What remains. If these markets in place of those we have lost are vital to the interests of the workers of this country, who depend upon employment for their livelihood, where are we to look for them? Why, where should we look? Except to the Colonies, to the markets of our kith and kin beyond the seas? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, in whose speech the other night I thought I detected a note of indifference to the Colonies, said the trade of our Colonies can take care of itself, and we must dissociate ourselves from any idea of Colonial preference. I differ from the right hon. Gentleman in toto on this point. We often hear that no offer has been made to us by the Colonies, that there is no disposition on their part to meet us. No disposition to meet us? Why, already they voluntarily give us a preference, some of 33 per cent. others of 25 per cent. and so on, over foreign countries. And have we not had a note of warning of the very first importance upon this point? Let me read a passage from the "Summary of Proceedings" of the Conference between the Colonial Secretary and the Colonial Ministers in 1902—

> "The Colonial Ministers stated that if they could be assured that the Imperial Government . . . would grant to the food products of Canada in the United Kingdom exemption from duties now levied or hereafter imposed, they would be prepared to go further into the subject, and endeavour to give to the British manufacturer some increased advantage over his foreign competitors in the markets of Canada. . . . Meanwhile they determined to present to the Conference a Resolution affirming the principle of preferential trade and the desirability of its adoption by the Colonies, also expressing the opinion that the Government should reciprocate by granting preferential terms to the products of the Colonies in the markets of the mother country."

Then they concluded with this very significant warning—

> "If, after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the Empire, the Canadian Government should find that the principle of preferential trade is not acceptable to the mother country generally, or to the Colonies, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions."

Surely that statement should do something to dispel the illusions of the hon. Member for Bristol—and what is the only inference we can draw from it? Why, that we cannot stand still. We must go forward, or else we shall go back; and, if we are to go forward, where else have we to look to but to our Colonies? What is the objection to this proposal? Excepting that it may lead to difficulties with the Colonies instead of to increased advantages, I have not heard what seems to me to be a single reasonable objection urged against it. Let me say why I think the balance of argument is distinctly in favour of the proposal. There are Members present who have had some experience of the Colonies. I would ask them is there anyone who has had the same experience, or is so universally recognised as the best Colonial Secretary we have ever had, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? When my right hon. friend the Member for West Bristol, or the Leader of the Opposition, or any other distinguished Member opposite tells me that the Colonies will not do this, that, or the other; that you cannot successfully negotiate with them; that this policy, if tried, will end only in raising greater difficulties than exist at present—my answer to them one and all is that the man who is acknowledged to be the best Colonial Secretary we have ever had takes the opposite opinion, and if I have to choose between two conflicting opinions I prefer his opinion to theirs. One objection is that this policy cannot be carried out without some duties on food. Everybody knows how trifling the duties which have been proposed are.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): At present.

*Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not know what reason the right hon. Baronet has for doubting the right hon. Gentleman for West Birmingham when he distinctly states that any duties he imposes will not be high duties—that they are to be low duties, not exceeding 2s. a quarter on corn.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE: Is it not a matter of certainty that they will have to be increased to carry out their object?

*Mr. CHAPLIN: That is precisely one of those differences of opinion between the ex-Colonial Secretary and hon. Gentlemen opposite in which I prefer the opinion of my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham. It is often stated that the policy will raise the price of living. I deny it; and on the other hand, I affirm—and I am prepared to argue and demonstrate before any audience in the world—that if this proposal is adopted, it will result in actually reducing the cost of living, instead of increasing, to the poor. And who are the people who object to the proposal of a 2s. duty on corn? Some gentlemen, I regret to say, on my own side have even left the Government in consequence of it, and yet, one and all are men who, only two years ago not merely voted for, but most energetically supported and defended the imposition of a similar duty upon food, the only distinction being that in one case it would have increased the cost of the loaf by something less than half a farthing, while in this case it would increase the cost by something less than a whole farthing. Lord Goschen, one of the keenest opponents of this proposal, defended the imposition of the shilling duty, with consummate ability in the House of Lords, and, in the course of an admirable speech, he maintained at that time that—

> "If the duty had been 2s. the bakers would have hesitated to raise the price of bread."

It is upon this trifling charge, this imperceptible distinction, that some of my oldest and best friends, for whom I entertain the deepest regard, have thought it necessary to leave the Government of the Party with which they have been associated all their lives. And now, we know from experience that the duty imposed two years ago did not affect the price of bread in the slightest degree ["Oh!"]—Well, if you do not believe me, let me read on this point a statement made by a leader of the Labour Party who has been adopted as the Labour candidate for one of the divisions of Manchester. This statement was made on the morning before his adoption—

> "He might say that when the duty of 1s. was put on a few years ago the workers did not pay the 1s. It had been his duty to ascertain the price of bread, and he had visited shops in Hulme and Salford for that purpose on the 1st of the month, the results of which visit he sent to the Board of Trade. All the time the registration duty was on the price of bread, so far as Manchester was concerned, did not vary in the slightest degree."

If, therefore, there is nothing in the objection on the score of food, what is there that remains? There is absolutely nothing so far as I know except some minor objections urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol, in which he puts to me some questions; one of them was—

> "How will you be able to resist the demand for an increase in the duty however small they are at first?"

And he quoted other countries, like Germany and France, where they began with duties of 1s. and then 2s., which have now risen to 12s. But surely the answer is complete. It can never be raised except by the will of the voters themselves, and there is all the difference in the world between the conditions of the two countries, and of the voters in France and Germany and the conditions of our own country of the voters here. This argument has been raised over and over again in the country, and it has been used by men who ought to have known better. It is not conceivable that they are not aware of the reply to it. A vast number of voters in France are peasants owning little farms, they possess an enormous political influence, and it is because they wish it and desire it that those duties have been raised and are maintained as they are. But the position in those countries is exactly the opposite of what it is with us. Here the great majority of the people own no land at all. Their first requirement here is a cheap and abundant supply of food, and they have the power, which they use, and they always will be able to enforce it. The same thing holds good in Germany, though not precisely to the same extent; and in Germany there is another reason in addition—she has an enormous military frontier to defend. At any moment it is conceivable that Germany may be involved in war with some of her neighbours, and then instantly all the food which comes across her frontiers would be stopped; and therefore it is a matter of absolute military necessity that she should grow the main portion of her own food supply. But none of those conditions attach to us and it is the most futile argument to say that because duties in France and Germany began at 1s. and went up to 12s. that it is inevitable that the same thing would happen in this country. Then my right hon. friend says that I maintain that these duties will not raise the price of wheat, or the cost of living, and yet I tell the farmers they will be of help to them. The statement is not altogether accurate, for I never said they would not raise prices. What I did say was that the duties on corn would not raise the price of bread. The other duties might raise the price of food to a very trifling extent. Although they will not raise the price of bread, the duties upon corn will be, small though they are, I believe, some advantage and some help to the farmer.

The right hon. Gentleman asks me if colonial preference is to be limited to food or is it also to be extended to manufactures. The answer to that has been stated over and over again by the ex-Colonial Secretary, who says it is impossible to lay down the precise details of any arrangement for colonial preference with regard to manufactures until a mandate has been given by the country and until either he or others are in a position to begin the negotiations. My right hon. friend said—

> "But if the duties will not raise prices, will the Member for Sleaford tell me why maize and bacon are excluded?"

As regards bacon, I have never said that the price of meat may not be to a trifling extent raised; and in reply to his question upon maize, I will answer it by asking him another. Why did the right hon. Gentleman himself draw a distinction between the 1s. duty on flour and maize? The duty on maize was made less than the duty on wheat by the right hon. Gentleman, when he imposed the 1s. duty in the first instance, and it is for the same reason, I believe, that maize is excluded now. But all these things are details and are lost in the great principle which is before us, and upon that my mind is absolutely made up. When my right hon. friend asks me and others, as he did the other night from that place, to abandon and give up the policy which we have been advocating in the country, little does he know the character of the man or those who support him if he thinks or believes we would ever entertain that notion for a moment. I oppose the Amendment for the reasons I have given already, and I support the Government because their policy, so far as it goes, is good. But above all I support the views which I advocate to-night because I believe them to be absolutely necessary in the future interests of the country, and above all in the interests of the workers who depend upon employment, and because I believe them to be right. I support them because I not only believe, but I know—I am not speaking now of the House of Commons—I know they represent the feeling of that great Party in the country with which for all my life I have been connected, and, sooner or later, I am absolutely persuaded and convinced that they will ultimately triumph and prevail.

Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I have listened with a great deal of interest to the very able speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford, and I hope he will not think me disrespectful if I do not follow him through the arguments and figures which he has placed before the House. They are not new to us, for they have frequently been brought before the country during the autumn campaign and I think I may say they have been answered. [Cries of "No, No!"] I will confine myself to traversing one or two statements he made with regard to the growth of the German iron and steel industry as compared with our own. The right hon. Gentleman attributed the growth of Germany industrial prosperity to Bismarckian protectionism of 1879. Is he not aware that industrial prosperity advanced more rapidly under the lower duties of many years ago than during the time of Bismarck?

Mr. CHAPLIN: My impression is that a great increase took place in later years.

Mr. BRYCE: That increase occurred after the tariffs were lowered. Exports of iron and steel during the last three years have risen 20 per cent. in England, whereas the imports have been almost stationary, and the same argument applies to the woollen trade. There again there has been an increase in spite of the statements to the contrary which have so often been made. The right hon. Gentleman quoted the dictum of Mr. Gladstone to the effect that if protection is given to any manufacturing industries it must also be given to agriculture. I agree that you cannot protect the manufacturing industries without doing something for the oldest and still the greatest of all our industries. A 2s. duty on corn has been mentioned, but I have heard members of the protectionist party say that not less than 10s., 15s., or 20s. a quarter would be of any substantial use to the farmers of this country. Will the right hon. Gentleman promise that he will never ask us for more than a 2s. duty on corn? Is that the utmost limit of his desires? I believe that 2s. would only be the beginning and it would gradually mount higher and higher.

It is a very significant fact in this debate that nearly all the speeches in support of the Government have come from the protectionist Members of this House. The subject is very large and important, so large that if it were not for the exigencies of other public business we might go on discussing it—even if the discussion were confined to the other side of the House, where such difference of opinion exists—for another fortnight or three weeks. But I think there is another subject very interesting in the debate besides the great question of protection and free trade. It has been a debate largely devoted to a search for, and inquiry into, the policy of His Majesty's Government. That is what we are largely engaged in endeavouring to discover. It is not an easy question. Their policy is an evasive and elusive policy, and when it has been discovered, as some of us hope we have discovered it, it turns out to be a very small policy, infinitesimal in quantity. The policy represents a particle of radium almost invisibly small, but it does not resemble radium in this respect—it is by no means luminous. We have had three speeches from the Government. The first was that of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade. There is no more clear thinker in the House than the President of the Board of Trade, and no one better able to express what his opinions are. I think I may venture to say that there is no one whose statements with regard to his own opinions we may except with more unqualified confidence. His speech was an encouragement to those of us who desire to see the Government come down on the free-trade side, but it was by no means a complete deliverance, because I noticed that he said he was himself not in favour of protection for Great Britain. He was careful to say that he was speaking only for himself and not for the Government, and he went so far as to say that, although he was not personally in favour of colonial preference, he hoped the time would arrive when the country would be in favour of colonial preference. That was an alarming deliverance to those who think a wish is very apt to find expression in means being taken to carry it out. When my right hon. friend calling himself a free-trader says that, I begin to fear that he and those who act with him will endeavour to accelerate the arrival of the period. The second speech was that of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade. It was just such a speech as might be delivered to the Tariff Reform League. The third speech was that of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. It was a very brilliant effort because the right hon. Gentleman, if he will allow me to say so, succeeded in attaining what is one of the rarest attitudes of an expert Parliamentarian. He made a speech and said nothing. We were really no wiser as to the policy and intentions of the Government after the right hon. Gentleman sat down. I can only suppose that he thought it the best way. For the hon. Gentleman said too much in Wiltshire and too little at Westminster. If this is the attitude in which we are still left with regard to the intentions of the Government, we may properly look at what are the broad facts of the case.

Now, what is the attitude of the Prime Minister? The Prime Minister said at Sheffield that what we wanted was a fundamental reversal of the free-trade policy of this country. He has allowed his free-trade colleagues to go out of the Cabinet. Why did he allow them to go out? We know from their deliverances that it was not on the policy of retaliation they left the Government. Then we had a significant deliverance by the Prime Minister at Manchester. He put forward that his main duty in the present crisis was to keep his Party together. He seemed to forget for the moment that he was Prime Minister of this country and to remember only that he was leader of the Conservative Party. I think that is hardly a proper attitude for a Prime Minister. He ought to feel his duty to the nation as well as his Party. He conveyed the impression that he was thinking at this crisis not of what was best for the nation, not of the duty of the Government to lay their policy before the nation, but of his duty at all hazards to keep the Conservative Party together. What conclusion does one draw from such a deliverance? That he will take the course that seems best calculated to keep his Party together, that he will watch how the Party is going, and that he will endeavour to ride in the direction that the Party is going, so that the unity of the Party may be maintained. What was the attitude of the Conservative Party? When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham launched his scheme it contained four items — colonial preference, food tax, retaliation, and the 10 per cent. duty on manufactured goods—the last of which came a little after the others. What the country has seen in the discussion during the whole of last autumn was that the food tax is not wanted except by the land-owning interest; that colonial preference has been coldly received and would not succeed if it had not been mixed up with retaliation; retaliation had been better received than colonial preference, but standing by itself it would not excite any enthusiasm at all. That which has excited enthusiasm has been the proposal of protection for manufactured goods, only qualified by the wish and the hope that it was higher than the 10 per cent. now suggested. Now, the real issue before the country is not retaliation. It is whether we are to have retaliation as defined by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham or free trade. The real force behind the whole agitation is protection. That was said with perfect candour by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sleaford. We were told yesterday by a leading Member of the Conservative Party that in the country those who refused to follow in that direction were being ostracised and boycotted. The President of the Board of Trade said that the 10 per cent. was proposed because it would bring in revenue. Is it because it would bring in revenue that it is acclaimed by those manufacturers on the mock Royal Commission, and who are sitting now to say how it should be imposed? Surely we all know and feel that the real force and interest of the manufacturers who are supporting the movement is in order that they may make gain by this tariff. It may be proper gain, that I do not discuss. We cannot possibly ignore the motive behind the movement. What is perhaps still more conclusive proof of the phenomena is that nearly all the candidates standing in support of the Government are protectionist candidates, and that in the course of their candidature they narrow down the programme with which they begin.

What is the conclusion we may reasonably draw from the attitude of the Government and their Party? I venture to think that the Government are hardly dealt with by some of their own supporters on the other side of the House. The hon. Member for Oldham in the vivacious and interesting speech he gave us yesterday attributed to them deliberately dark designs. I think he could not overrate the craft of the Government, but he underrates its weakness. It does not seem to me to be out of deliberate purpose to beguile their supporters or the country, but out of mere hesitation, that they are adopting this doubtful attitude which baffles the desire to find out what they mean. They are playing a sort of see-saw between free trade and protection, but if we look at the attitude of the Government and if we see what is happening in their Party, we may feel certain that if the reins are held so loosely as this the horse will run away with the driver. I cannot doubt, when I see how strong the passion of protection is, that unless there is a fundamental reversal of the policy of facing both ways which has distinguished the Government during the last six months they will be swept, whether they will or not, into a purely protectionist Party. The President of the Board of Trade said the Government would fight for free trade. It is a very feeble kind of fighting that they have done so far, and I hope that at any rate when the Colonial Secretary speaks he will endeavour to clear up the darkness of the position. My right hon. friend the Member for Cambridge University asked some questions, but neither the Colonial Secretary, nor any Member on the Treasury Bench rose to answer. I hope he will answer them now. It is surely not necessary that we should wait for the return of the Prime Minister to have an answer. These are not matters of Parliamentary tactics, but questions on which the mind of the Government must have been constantly fixed for the last six months, and on which we must presume that they have a policy which every one of them knows. May I repeat them to the Colonial Secretary, and perhaps he will permit me, the first time I have the pleasure of addressing him, to offer him the congratulations of many friends on this side of the House on the post he has attained in His Majesty's Government. May I venture to ask him—Will the Government not merely fight as the President of the Board of Trade says for free trade, but will they fight against protection? Will they fight against protection by repudiating protectionist candidates, where such candidates stand? Will they cease sending letters of encouragement to protectionist candidates? Will they cease to give aid and comfort to the protectionist Party? Will they declare themselves opposed in principle to colonial preference which necessarily involves the taxation of food? I will endeavour, if my right hon. friend doubts that, to show that colonial preference involves the taxation of food? These are points on which we are really entitled to have some answer from the Government, because without any answer we do not know in what direction to turn. Everyone of us on these Benches desires to support the Government against their opponents, followers of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. The Government say that protection or preference will not be in view at the next election. But will the Government tell us what will be in view at a more distant period? What gain is it to us to know that when the Government go to the next election they will be against protection and preference and only in favour of retaliation, if we also know that the great bulk of their supporters are in favour of both. Surely the Government have had sufficient time to consider this question to tell us what they think of the protectionist policy, and what is to be for the good of the country in the future beyond the next general election?

Let me come for a few moments to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on the subject of retaliation. Surely the argument for retaliation is the very thinnest that was ever presented to the nation. It is the very smallest and frailest barque which can carry the fortunes of a Government. What does it amount to? The idea is that we are to secure a fairer treatment for our exports by imposing, or threatening to impose, import duties on the goods of countries which have tariffs against ourselves. Of course, we can imagine a case in which retaliation might be profitable. I suppose the most orthodox economists have admitted that there might be a country to which protection might be profitable. So we can imagine a case in which retaliation might be a proper remedy. But does any case exist now? Will the Government give us a case, for it is only in that way that we can test whether retaliation can be imposed. There is a maxim that deceit lurks in generalities, and I do think that there is a good deal that leads to confusion and difficulty in those general statements in which the Government deal. They never give us a concrete case. What is it that they have in their mind? We are told that if a case of outrageous unfairness arises it may properly be dealt with by retaliatory duties. But what is outrageous and unfair? We are apt to talk as if foreign tariffs are imposed for the express purpose of injuring British trade. Is that true? Foreign tariffs are imposed for the purpose of benefiting foreign manufactures. We are free-traders because we believe that that policy is for our own interest; and it is not to injure manufacturers abroad that the duties are put on in Germany and the United States. If you say that if a tariff is so drawn and framed that it hits British goods, that it is outrageous and unfair, and that that is the test. In that case what do you say to the Colonies? There are no tariffs which have been drawn more clearly in the view that the competition of the colonial manufacturers is a competition with the British manufactures. And yet we all know that they are not drawn in a spirit of unfriendliness to us. The Colonies draw their tariffs in order to benefit their own people. There must be a strong case in order to show that there is a desire on the part of foreign Governments to benefit foreign manufactures with an unfriendly and hostile feeling against us. The President of the Board of Trade says that the Government wants the power to impose retaliatory duties against foreign countries who have high tariffs. But have they not got that already. There is nothing to prevent them coming down to the House and proposing duties which would induce foreign Governments to reduce their tariffs. I do not understand why this proposal requires a tremendous reversal of our existing policy. I believe that there is a statute that expressly provides for that, and there is nothing in our Constitutional usage to prevent it. It is quite true that Sir Robert Peel said that he had tried retaliation and gave it up. In that famous deliverance of his which marked the turning point in our commercial fiscal policy, he declared that it was only after repeated efforts to adopt the policy of retaliation that he had been obliged to give it up in despair. There is nothing to prevent the Government adopting a retaliatory policy, but they must give us a concrete case, showing the benefit that would follow. They cannot assume that they should be granted general powers, by which alone they could impose retaliatory tariffs. I say that no Government should come before Parliament and ask that they should be allowed, without approaching the House of Commons, to ask authority to impose retaliatory duties or to alter existing duties up or down. That would be to inflict an injury on private interests. Our manufacturers are entitled to submit to Parliament a case of injury done to them by foreign tariffs, and it is impossible that the Government should have the power to impose retaliatory duties on foreign goods without that information before them. The President of the Board of Trade was unfortunate in his statement of this part of the case of the Government. I cannot gather whether he contemplated that there was any case in which the Government desired to act without having first the authority of Parliament; and I wish he would clear that point up. It is a thing on which the Government must be informed before the general election, and I do not see why Parliament should not be informed of it now.

Let me take a concrete case, in order to show the difficulty of the position. There is no country whose import duties, whose high tariff, injures our trade so much as the United States. Of course, the Russian tariff is higher, but the United States is a much bigger market. It would be absurd to retaliate against any country if not against the United States. But on their own showing the Government could not retaliate against food from the United States; and they could not retaliate against raw material either. What remains? Only manufactured articles. But the manufactures we import from the United States are valued at £20,000,000, and more than one half of these are either practically raw materials or half-manufactured goods, so that there is only £8,000,000 or £10,000,000 worth of goods which it would be possible to attack. Do you suppose that retaliation on a trifle of that kind would injure the United States? The United States, with its great home market, would not care for almost any duty you would impose. She would rely on her home market, and her manufacturers, who are exceeding powerful, would not allow their protective system to be broken down by a petty thing of that sort. Therefore, you cannot hope to retaliate on their manufactures. And the case of the United States applies à fortiori to every other kind of retaliation. The practical objection to retaliation is that it must be either one of two things. It must be either a mere threat, not intended to be followed up by the imposition of duties. But if a mere threat, then it is a game of bluff, and the game of bluff is not creditable to a great country. We have had enough of bluff already, and it was not successful with a small country. But on the other hand, if intended to be carried out seriously, see what the cost of putting on the retaliatory duties would be. In the first place you would have a tariff war, and in that war the duties of the foreign country would be raised against you.

Trade would suffer, and the diversion of trade from its accustomed channels would entail a very heavy loss. That was the experience of Germany and Russia, and the experience of the tariff war between France and Italy proved that there was not only a direct loss to trade, but that the trade did not come back to its old channels. In neither case can it be shown that trade was substantially benefited as the result of the tariff war. Then the second result of the imposition of retaliatory duties is that you accustom our own country to a policy of protection. It sees duties put on goods not for the purposes of revenue, and it familiarises the country to the idea of protection. Not only that, but you stimulate the desire of other trades, not so favoured, for protection. You put on a duty on a particular class of goods, let us say, iron or woollen goods, and you assume that that protection is given to that particular industry alone. But other industries would ask why they should be left out in the cold, and you would have a particular and growing pressure from these other industries to have the same benefit given to them as had been given to the other industries. And then, lastly, if the policy of retaliation succeeds, and if you bring down the duties against your own country, the natural course would be to take off your own duties. But you cannot, for you would be met with the great difficulty that those who had bought land, purchased machinery, erected works, and made all preparations for carrying on their business on the basis of these duties, would turn round and complain that you had deprived them of the benefit of the duties. That is not theory, but the experience of every protectionist country in the world. It is easy to impose protective duties, but very difficult to take them off. The appetite grows with the eating. By the very process with which the Government declares they are fighting for free trade, this country would become protectionist itself.

I notice that the President of the Local Government Board argued that by putting a retaliatory duty on you would prevent dumping. I thought I noticed a little confusion in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. Dumping is not done by foreign countries but by private persons, and retaliation will not prevent it unless the duty be high enough to keep the dumped goods out altogether. The only way in which you can prevent dumping is to dump yourselves, and that can only be done by making the home consumer pay more in order that you may be able to sell cheap abroad. Therefore, in order that you may have free trade in the rest of the world you will cease to have it yourselves. If you look abroad you will find that every country which practises retaliation is protectionist. I do not know of any free-trade country which has tried the policy of retaliation. There may be some countries that have tried it. I admit Holland is very nearly a free-trade country, and there are other countries which have such low tariffs that they are nearer free trade than protection. But it is only the countries which have high tariffs that practice retaliation. They do it with maximum and minimum tariffs, and to that we shall also be driven. It is only by having two tariff scales and shifting a country from one to the other that we can carry out a policy of retaliation. I do not deny that cases can be imagined in which a policy of retaliation may fairly be proposed; but I am sure the House of Commons will not trust that power to a protectionist Government. If we had a Government in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol was Chancellor of the Exchequer and in which the President of the Board of Trade retained his present office, I can imagine that the House of Commons might perhaps allow retaliation, although even then it would be a very dangerous experiment. But I am perfectly certain that with a Government such as we have, which contains so many avowed protectionists, it would be perfectly impossible for this House to permit retaliation. We oppose retaliation not merely because no case has been shown for it, not merely because we believe that a policy of a tariff war is a ruinous policy, but also because we believe that it would lead us straight to protection.

So much has been said on the general aspect of the question that I will not ask the House to listen to any more figures on the subject or to any disquisitions as to the effect protection would have on any particular trade or industry. But there are one or two general aspects of the question which I should like to ask the House to consider. This country having had free imports for two generations there is scarcely a man amongst us who is able to remember the old system. We nowadays can hardly realise how fortunate we have been. You want to live in a protectionist country in order to know what are the fruits of a high tariff. In comparing this country with countries which have a high tariff, I was struck by the fact that the relation of the classes to each other in this country is more friendly and more wholesome than it is in protectionist countries. There is less jealousy, less suspicion, and less of the idea that one class is making profit at the expense of another in this country than there is in countries where manufacturers or agriculturists are allowed to enrich themselves at the expense of the consumer. I think we should be doing very little service to our politics and social order if we were to give occasion for the complaints and heartburnings which would necessarily and naturally arise between classes if one class thought its interests were being sacrificed for the benefit of another class. If the price of manufactured articles increased there would be at once a demand on the part of the workmen for higher wages. In some industries it is possible wages would be increased, but in other industries, less directly concerned with production, and above all in unskilled industry, wages would not increase but the cost of living would rise; and, therefore, you would put a greater pressure on the poorest classes of the community and there would be a reiterated demand for higher wages in order to enable the poor man to meet the increased cost of living. That is to say, you would probably inaugurate an era of strife and trade disputes by the very fact that the consumer would be paying more for the necessaries of life without having higher wages. It is possible that there might be a general rise of wages over the whole field of labour; but that would take a long time to come about. If, however, there was a rise of wages in the cotton industry it would mean the discontinuance of our cotton exports in some lines of business, because the cotton trade in some of its lines is conducted on such a narrow margin of profit that if the cost of production were enhanced it would be impossible to carry it on.

There is another advantage which any one who visits a protectionist country such as the United States will perceive that we possess under our system of free imports. Any one looking at the legislation of this country would be almost surprised to notice how small a part of our daily legislation affects the pecuniary interests of individuals. Very few of our Acts of Parliament have the effect of putting money into or taking money out of the pockets of any individual, or taking money or giving it to any class or trade. We stand almost alone in that respect. In a protectionist country a large part of the legislation is occupied in making changes in the tariff which operate to the pecuniary benefit of one class or another, and the greatest interest in legislation is excited by that part of the work of the Legislature. In fact it may be said that the Legislature in a protectionist country is chiefly occupied with tariff questions. It is only now and again that the tariff is wholly changed but the subject is never at rest. The manufacturers are an organised body and are constantly at work conveying their view to the members of the Legislature and to the executive Government and pressing for tariff changes which would benefit them. This causes constant uncertainty, and a business man never knows on what basis he may have to conduct his business, as he does not know whether the tariff is to go up or down. Large business organisations are formed whose sole business is to control the Legislature. The iron men, the soft goods men, and so on, form themselves into organisations whose object is to influence the Legislature. They subscribe large funds with which they create an agitation all over the country, and when an election comes they offer funds to the Party supposed to be most in their favour, and pledge that Party to their support. At present there are comparatively few questions in which we are concerned with the pecuniary interests of individuals or of constituences, but as soon as we have a protective tariff we shall have each constituency looking at the issues to be decided, not from the point of view of the general interests of the country, but from the point of view of what it may gain or lose. That is a necessary result of a fluctuating tariff. If we have avoided all these evils, need we suppose it is because of some peculiar quality inherent in our own nature. There was a time in the 18th century when the Parliament of England had not that purity which it now has; and if we have maintained an exceptionally high level of purity in public life and legislation, may it not be partly due to the fact that we have, to quite an exceptional degree, removed all temptation, and that we have given our legislators no opportunity of serving private pecuniary interests as is so often done in many other countries. When I think of the enormous benefit it has been to us to have our Legislature free from all these disturbing and malign influences which damage public life, I cannot but regard with the greatest alarm any proposal to follow the example of other countries in which changes of tariff are common, and in which it is possible for a Government to help a particular branch of industry.

We have heard a great deal about the predictions of Cobden. There is one prediction of his to which I wish to call attention. Some of his predictions have not been realised, but the fact that a prediction has not been realised is no reason for abandoning the policy behind it. Cobden predicted that with the growth of free government the world would be more at peace. We have had free government, but the world is not at peace; but we do not abandon on that account free government. The last fifty years has been the only period in English history when we have not been at war with a great Continental Power. May we not attribute that in some degree to the fact that all the great Continental countries, and the United States also, have good reason for keeping open trade with the country which gives them the best market. I know there have been moments when peace has been in danger, and when the fact that there was a strong interest in great manufacturing countries, such as France, Germany, or the United States, to keep open trade with England was a most powerful though silent influence in the direction of peace, and it would be a great misfortune for us to lose the security for peace which our great free market gives. There is, unhappily, enough of ill feeling between nations without losing such an advantage in the direction of preserving peace.

I want to know from the Colonial Secretary if he is in favour of colonial preference, whether he contemplates that any such preference is to extend to their manufactured goods. Would the 10 per cent. proposed by the right hon. Member for Birmingham on manufactured goods apply to the Colonies as well as foreign countries. Would colonial manufactures be admitted without a duty or would it be imposed upon them. If it were imposed upon them, what became of the union with the Colonies which we are told to expect? If it is not intended to be imposed upon them, and they are recognised as being entitled to have a preference on manufactured goods as well as foodstuffs, would not such preference be more or less of a bonus and stimulus for them to manufacture against us? Canada gave her steel manufacturers a bonus which actually doubled the amount of iron and steel we received from her. In that case dumping would go on, and the Colonies would obtain advantages which they were never intended to have. I am afraid that a system of commercial treaties within the Empire may really retard that federation which the right hon. Member for Birmingham desires. There is nothing the Colonies care more about than their own fiscal freedom, and every bargain made between the mother country and a colony will be the subject of discussion in the Colonial Legislature, the question being whether the bargain is not too good for us and too bad for them. I have talked with many protectionists in France and the United States, and I never met one of them yet who did not admit that, although he thinks protection good for his own country, he believes free trade is good for England. They all say that. I suppose hon. Gentlemen believe foreign protectionists believe it to be their interest to say so. I assure them that this statement has been made to me in moments of confidence. During the last seventy years we have built up a mighty fabric of commerce and trade unknown even relatively at any other stage of the world's history, and we have done that by trusting to the British race. We have built up our trade by the energies of our own people. While our competitors were relying on high tariffs and protected markets, we have followed the course that nature has marked out for us. The policy of free imports is the only true policy for an island nation such as we are, lying as we do between the old world and new; an island people unable to provide our own food, and a people eminently fitted to undertake maritime pursuits, with the result that we do two-thirds of the commerce of the whole world. We have set an example to the world in persevering with this free-trade policy for the last sixty or seventy years, and now, as the Government desires free trade, they will do it a very bad turn by making this country protectionist. If we persevere and set an example of self-reliance and conform to economic law, it will be to our lasting honour that we have given a very powerful help to those forces of reason and justice which are making for free trade in protectionist countries.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): I will first thank the right hon. Gentleman for the courtesy and kindness of his personal reference to myself; but as far as I could follow his speech the first part of it was devoted to showing that retaliation was a very small thing, a trifle in itself, while the latter was devoted to showing that it was a very serious thing [Mr. BRYCE: In its consequences], and would lead to tariff wars. You cannot have it both ways. At any rate, it was serious enough to cause the resignation of my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon.

MR. RITCHIE (Croydon): No. Really I should have thought that the explanation I gave of the reasons of my retirement would have shown my right hon. friend that retaliation was not the cause.

*MR. LYTTELTON: Yes, Sir, but my right hon. friend admitted himself, in writing, on 15th September, that—

> "Any proposal for retaliatory duties would inevitably lead to protection, and produce far greater evils than they were destined to prevent."

Mr. Bryce.

MR. RITCHIE: If my right hon. friend is going to quote the letter he had better read it all.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have read the point in the letter which I thought was relevant to the matter I had in hand.

MR. RITCHIE: If my right hon. friend will not read the whole letter I must read another paragraph of it—

> "I am in entire sympathy with the desire to unite the mother country and the Colonies more closely together, but I know of no method by which preferential treatment can be accorded to the Colonies other than that which has been advocated by the Colonial Secretary—namely, the taxation of food, which involves, as a consequence, an increase of taxation. To this policy I am opposed."

*MR. LYTTELTON: I quoted the passage on which I relied, and, with great deference to my right hon. friend, the passage just read does not appear to require any modification of my original statement. Now I wish to say with perfect frankness at the outset that I do not intend, in a debate on the Address, to discuss a scheme for preferential duties which is not part of the scheme of the present Government, and into the details of which of course I cannot enter. There were two questions asked by the right hon. Member for Cambridge University which I think were fair Questions. One was, "Will the Government support those who honestly support the Government fiscal programme?" My answer is, "The Government will support those who honestly support the Government programme." The second question was, "Will they oppose those candidates who go further than the fiscal programme of the Government in opinion, and who may be the advocates of colonial preference?" My answer is, "Yes; they will support those candidates who are in favour of the Government fiscal programme, even if their own opinions go farther than it." I hope that these two answers are at least plain. The noble Lord the Member for the Ealing Division of Middlesex appealed to those members of the Government who were going to speak after him not to go beyond the President of the Board of Trade in their utterances on this subject. I venture to think there ought to be reciprocity on the part of anyone who makes that demand. My noble friend the Member for Greenwich made a very able and eloquent speech. It would be unpardonable of me to demand relevance or materiality from most Members in a peroration, but from my noble friend I think I may do so, for he is lucid even when impassioned and he is clear though fervid. In his peroration he referred to a certain view of the Empire as a view of a gigantic profit-sharing business, and I suppose in doing that he endeavoured to cast some blame or reflection on the policy of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. Since I have been at the Colonial Office I have been very much impressed by the business qualities of my distinguished predecessor. They are at once my envy and my despair. But I am even more impressed by the ideals and the traditions which he has left behind him. It would be a gross injustice to describe the policy of my right hon. friend as a policy which was in any sense dictated by mean and sordid ideas. I do not think my noble friend believed that that was the case; but I should like to bear testimony to the fact that there is no portion of the work of my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham at the Colonial Office which does not impress me with the great traditions and the great ideals of my predecessor with regard to the Colonies and colonial policy.

With regard to colonial preference, I appeal to my friends and to my opponents not to close the door upon it. They ask us not to support it. Let me beg of them, as one who has something to do with the Colonies, not to commit themselves against it. After all, what a man of genius and great historic imagination said fifty or sixty years ago on this subject is still true. Carlyle said—

> "Our little isle is grown too narrow for us, but the world is wide enough yet. For another six thousand years England's sure markets will be among new Colonies of Englishmen in all quarters of the globe. The mother country can say, looking on her Colonies, 'Here are lands and seas, spice lands, corn lands, timber lands, overarched by zodiacs and stars, clasped by many sounding seas; wide spaces of the Maker's building fit for the cradle yet of mighty nations and their sciences and heroisms."

The tendency is, if I may say so, on the part of some speakers, to shut the door on this splendid ideal. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I think that my noble friend the Member for Greenwich, when he spoke of profit-sharing and when he examined so minutely the balance-sheet as between the Colonies and ourselves, fell into the very error which the last speaker referred to—I mean the error of going too nicely into considerations of profit and loss and in not considering sufficiently the great ideal in question. I do not wish to argue the matter. I have said distinctly on several occasions before that I thought the future of colonial preference and its details required further discussion, cautious and deliberate discussion, before it is embarked upon, but it is no part at this time of the policy of the Government. Let me recall the actual history of the situation at the present time. Canada is ready to go even beyond the 33⅓ per cent. which she gives us. South Africa has carried out the Conference proposals made by the Customs Union. New Zealand has just passed a statute by which she gives a preference to this country sometimes double, sometimes 50 per cent., and sometimes 20 per cent. As regards the Commonwealth of Australia, according to my latest information, Mr. Deakin indicated in an interview that it was entirely erroneous for a London newspaper to say that the result of the elections was dead against Mr. Chamberlain's policy. That policy was supported by the whole of the Ministerial Party in Australia, by the majority of the Labour Party, and by an influential minority of the Opposition.

*SIR. CHARLES DILKE: Has he not since that interview pledged himself not to propose legislation in that direction?

*MR. LYTTELTON: My predecessor has endeavoured to knit closer the bonds between us and the Colonies; and since I have been in my present office I have done everything I possibly could to foster the sentiment referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, and to obtain greater co-operation in Imperial defence, greater mutual knowledge, greater co-operation in Imperial counsel; and, inasmuch as we have got so much closer connection with the Colonies by these means, will you not regret it if you say that in the great sphere of commerce alone a closer link is to be wholly excluded? I trust that I make my position perfectly clear. Colonial preference is not a portion of the Government programme, but I do ask every hon. Member, and especially the Imperial Members of the Party opposite ["Oh, Oh!"] to pause a long time before they commit themselves to any view hostile to it. An attempt has been made, principally by the right hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs and my noble friend the Member for Greenwich, to put the issue before the country as if it was the issue between protection and free trade. The right hon. Gentleman, in a passage not characterised by his usual urbanity and logical sequence of thought, accused me and Mr. Charles Booth of being protectionists. The point was whether Mr. Charles Booth and I were protectionists because we were in favour of a 5 per cent. all-round uniform duty. Is that protection? [Cries of "Yes."] If that is a protectionist view, then the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the late Government are surely protectionists, for they were responsible for the Government of India, and the Government of India fiscal system is a 5 per cent. all-round duty.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): The right hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that the Government at home sanctioned the imposition of a 5 per cent. duty in India, but they insisted on the imposition of a corresponding Excise duty.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I think that the Excise duty is only on one commodity—namely, cotton. Just see the looseness with which this term is used, and the absurdity of any Gentleman, however distinguished, attempting to rule out a policy by calling it what he thinks to be a bad name. If Mr. Charles Booth is a protectionist because he advocates a 5 per cent. all-round duty, then every Cabinet Minister of the last Liberal Administration is a protectionist, because they were responsible for the 5 per cent. duty in India. [Cries of "Oh!"] Right hon. Gentlemen opposite do not seem altogether satisfied with that line of reasoning. [OPPOSITION Cheers.] As they do not like a specific instance, may I give them authority in the matter? Will any right hon. Gentleman, however orthodox, refuse to accept Sir George Cornewall Lewis as an authority on fiscal matters? What did he say in 1857, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer? He quoted the words of Arthur Young—

> "If I were to define a good system of taxation, it would be that of bearing lightly on an infinite number of points and heavily on none."

And he added—

> "These opinions, though contrary to much that we hear at the present day, seem to me to be full of wisdom and to be a most practical guide in the arrangement of a system of taxation."

I think I have disposed of the point [Cries of "Oh!"] as to whether the advocacy of such a duty as the 5 per cent. all-round duty in trade entitles any fair-minded man to call the advocate a protectionist. Suppose that, having such a duty on commodities, you used it, though imposed for revenue purposes, for the purpose say, of colonial preference, does that make it a protectionist duty? [Cries of "Yes" from the FREE TRADE UNIONISTS.] I observe that the Opposition is rather more cautious than the free-food Party. If a duty is imposed for the purposes of revenue, are you debarred from using it for other purposes? [Cries of "Yes."] If so, you must say that if a tax, put on for any purpose, incidentally benefits the home producer or our colonial kinsmen, it becomes protective. That seems to me to be pushing orthodoxy to the verge of fanaticism. If I put a duty on a commodity for revenue purposes, and if I am told that I cannot use that duty for the purposes of colonial preference or in order to benefit the home producer, I venture to say that any candid-minded man would say that this is not business but asceticism. It is not rational loyalty to a doctrine; but the superstitious worship of a dogma. [Cheers and cries of "Oh!"]

There is no man in the House from whom I would more cheerfully accept banter than the right hon. Member for Montrose. I did not expect him to have read any of my speeches at Leamington, but he put one of them in the forefront of his observations. I would make this very modest demand, however, that if he dignifies any utterance of mine in that way he will first read my speech and then quote it accurately. He asked me whether I was ignorant that Kingsley and Carlyle and Ruskin were opponents of the Corn Laws. Yes, Sir, I knew that when I was at Eton. I did not quote those distinguished men as advocates of the Corn Laws. They were opposed to them as I should have been. I quoted them as enemies and assailants of the old doctrine of laissez faire of the Ricardian economists. I do not think that anyone who has read any of those authors will attempt to deny that they were opponents of those doctrines. The right hon. Gentleman said that "the gloomy doctrinaires" would have made short work of me. That does not much concern me, because those doctrines are as dead as their authors. What is the general principles on which free-traders act? They were laid down long ago by Adam Smith. The first was, "Give me what I want and I will give you what you want." The next is, "The merchant is not a citizen of any particular country;" and the third is that the individual, by following his own advantage, is necessarily led to benefit society. Those are the fundamental doctrines of Adam Smith, and I think I fairly represent them, and they are really the basis of the doctrine of free trade. In trade there are no obligations of patriotism, said the free-traders. From the dealings of trade must be eliminated the prejudice of country. The great wheel of commerce must revolve monotonously, no matter whom it crushes in its orbit. It is weakness and sentimentality, they think, to attempt to check the friction and loss and suffering which might result from the remorseless progress of commerce entirely uninterfered with by law. In my speech at Leamington I pointed out that that was the doctrine against which men strove for a long time, and that the various Factory Acts, which were designed to save and support the worker, were expressions of a revolt against this doctrine. The deduction to be drawn from these Acts was, I said, that you cannot abandon human beings to blind forces, and that you must keep a controlling hand upon the conditions of industry and have a regard to the physical well-being of those who are engaged in an industrial system. The underlying lesson to be learnt from this conflict of the last fifty years is expressed in that legislation—of which it will not be denied the Conservative Party were the pioneers, though the Liberal Party have fully supported and adopted the principles—which is a negation of the fundamental doctrines of Adam Smith and an affirmation of the principle that individuals cannot be left to pursue their own advantage uncontrolled by any other consideration. In other words, you must not consider merely the aggregation of wealth. You must also consider the ultimate effects upon society. What I venture to think is the corollary from those premises which I have just laid before the House is that the lesson has been thoroughly learnt in internal trade, but it is not—and this appears to me to be so astonishing—so clearly perceived in international trade. While the Legislature of this country says, on the one side, "We cannot disregard the conditions of industry, and we will not allow wealth to be produced without consideration of them," you cannot have the Legislature saying, on the other side, "We will open every port at every time to all goods produced under all conditions," and so proclaim at the same time to all the world that we have not one single weapon with which to defend the fabric that we have raised. How is it possible that those two systems can have any congruity? How is it possible that they can stand for any length of time side by side? The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean gave out of his repository of facts a list of a number of laws in foreign countries which he said were as good laws as ours.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE: Yes, and some much in advance.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Yes. My point was that the conditions of industry under which commodities were produced in England were greatly superior to those of the great protective countries abroad. I have not the slightest doubt that the conditions of industry here are much better, but I do not ask him to accept my authority; I will give him the authority of the right hon. Member for East Fife. He said—

"Talk about Germany and the wages of a protectionist country! I hope you will compare from the materials the Blue book has placed at your disposal, the wages, the standard of living, and the hours of labour of the German workmen to your own."

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The right hon. Gentleman is perpetually quoting me as if I agreed in the doctrine he is laying down. I quoted his speech on the specific point that he alleged that protective duties must be put on to compensate us for our heavy charges on manufacturers in respect of certain specific Acts, which I say are met by Acts which put heavier charges on the manufacturers abroad.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I never said a word about protective duties at all. What I pointed out was that the conditions of industry in England which had been prescribed by the Legislature caused the output of commodities here to be dearer generally than the output of commodities abroad. I said that among other features which were noticeable was the fact that conditions of labour were very much worse abroad. I will quote another authority—the right hon. Member for Montrose. He said—

> "Next, in regard to Germany, it was a fact that some 4,000,000 of workers there, or two-thirds of the whole, were returned as earning less than 15s. a week. Sixty-five per cent. of the total were earning less than £40 per annum, and 85 per cent. less than £1 a week. Did these facts show Germany to be a paradise? So far from being a paradise it was not even purgatory, but a lower state still."

That is a country which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Forest of Dean says, so far as I can understand him, is producing commodities under the same conditions as we produce them ourselves.

We have had in the course of this debate very frequent references again, as to what I may call almost the elementary particulars of this subject. We have had trotted out again the old idea that you can look upon the consumer as one person, and the producer as another. It cannot be too often said that in 99 per cent. of cases the producer and the consumer are the same individual. Suppose that I were a workman earning £100 a year—suppose that I were a glass-worker, and that by the advantage of buying cheap commodities my income were £20 a year better than it would be if I had to buy at a dearer price. Suppose that by the process of dumping, or any process of unfair competition, my employer's business were annihilated; no doubt it would be very convenient that I should buy my commodities at £20 a year cheaper than I could under a different system, but suppose that my inherited skill in the work I had practised were lost, and that I was unable to find employment again for a year or two, and then at an employment and under conditions in which my training would be wholly useless, is it not obvious that the money which I save from buying cheaper commodities might be too dearly gained, and that the friction and loss and suffering which was occasioned by the sweeping away of the industry might be much heavier than the gain which I have made by being a purchaser of the cheaper commodities? I see that hon. Members smile at that as if the doctrine were something new. I do not profess for a moment that it is. [Cries of "No!"] I am sure that my right hon. friend the Member for Aberdeen will at any rate admit the honoured name of Professor Henry Sidgwick as a great authority on economic matters, and I think I could show him a passage which is the foundation of what I have endeavoured to lay before the House.

The right hon. Member reminds me of his question about colonial preference, but I thought that I had answered that at the beginning of my speech. I said that in a debate on the Address I would not enter into the question of what the details of colonial preference would be, colonial preference not being part of the Government programme, but being in the future only.

There is one general observation I should like to make in conclusion. I have tried to show that the sense of the community has revolted, at any rate in internal commerce, from the extreme doctrines of individualism, but yet that a large party maintain that they should still endure in international relations. I venture to think that the obstacle to our getting free from those doctrines is the strong sense—in many ways a very good thing—of individualism which exists in this country.

A French writer has said, "Men fall often by the same qualities by which they rise." In one period individual energy may be justified, but in a world of organised and be-tariffed communities, individual energy may fail in commerce as the undisciplined valour of the Gaul failed against the legions of Cæsar. It is a rule and practice in this House that when a proposal is brought forward by which individual enterprise, authorised by Parliament, is threatened by State or rate-aided competition very special circumstances must be adduced before any such competition is permitted. That recognises to some extent the powerlessness of individual enterprise when it matches itself with State or rate-aided enterprise. At the same time we do not recognise that in international trade relations at all. When I was a member of the Royal Commission upon the Port of London we had in evidence most interesting and elaborate statements with regard to the progress made by Germany and France in their dock enterprise, and we heard how docks in those countries, elaborately equipped and aided by the municipality and the State, were by an equally elaborate system supported by State railways. This great organisation of foreign trade, which must, I think, be regarded with alarm by those who think carefully upon it, is pitted against our individual enterprise. Hon. Members well know how fine an enterprise the London dock companies were at the beginning of last century. Now they are practically unable to raise a single shilling. They have been exhausted, almost financially annihilated, among other things, by the competition of these very great State and rate-aided institutions. If foreign companies have by means of this enterprise power to strike, they have also taken upon themselves the power to defend themselves by high tariffs. It is against such a system as that hon. Members opposite say that nothing can be done—that nothing effective can be done either by retaliation or otherwise. I rejoice to be a member of the Unionist Party, which at any rate is awake to the state of affairs which prevails at the present time, and which is ready and anxious to do its best to apply a remedy.

*MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said that the position in which the House had been placed by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary was curious. Throughout the debate they had been trying to obtain from the Government a clear statement of their policy. On Monday the President of the Board of Trade said that that policy was unhesitatingly against protection, and that even after the next general election, the Government would not take up colonial preference, or carry out the policy of retaliation, except by bringing each particular case before Parliament. But the speech of the Colonial Secretary to which they had just listened was steeped from beginning to end in preference and protection. The hon. Member for Cambridge University, speaking in the name of many on his own side of the House, asked if the Government would support candidates at the next General Election whose support of the Government was limited to the policy of retaliation. The Colonial Secretary, in reply, said that the Government would do so if these candidates were supporting the Government "honestly." The right hon. Gentleman laid emphasis on the word "honestly," and that practically amounted to a charge of dishonesty against hon. Gentlemen in this House whose conduct during the past few months had been a credit to themselves and to Parliament.

*MR. LYTTELTON said that the hon. Member must not say that. He made no charge of dishonesty against any hon. Gentleman in the House.

*MR. LOUGH said that the right hon. Gentleman took no exception when he mentioned that emphasis had been laid by him on the word "honestly," but only when he put a comment upon it. A second question had been asked by the hon. Member for Cambridge University—viz., would the Government lend their support to candidates and organisations which went further and advocated a policy of preference? That was a most momentous question, and the Colonial Secretary said that the Government would give their support to candidates who advocated colonial preference. How could the President of the Board of Trade reconcile that answer with what he had said a few days ago? It was scarcely honest for the Government not to be more candid to the House and the country in giving their real opinion on this matter. The Colonial Secretary had quoted a very noble passage from Carlyle. It was a pity to bring the splendid observations of that eminent literary man into the narrow sphere of political controversy in this House. They all agreed with Carlyle that our little Isle was grown too narrow for us, but, he maintained that the defence of free trade by the Liberal Party was a powerful instrument in the hands of Providence to build up that great colonial Empire which was being placed in danger by the action of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman talked as if the country had no experience of colonial preference. Did not the right hon. Gentleman know that we had had two centuries' experience of that policy? There was not a suggestion in the speeches of the Member for West Birmingham which had not been made over and over again years before the right hon. Gentleman was born. We had had preferences on sugar and timber and all the produce of the Colonies, and these had nearly brought about the disruption of the Empire. Gradually the principles of free trade had been substituted for that policy, and the effect on the Colonies had been to unite them with the mother country in stronger bonds than any merely selfish tie. The Colonial Secretary was not well advised in trying to make Party capital out of the confidence, love, and respect which they all entertained for the Colonies. The question was whether the good feeling which now existed would not be endangered by the policy of colonial preferences. It was admitted by the Member for West Birmingham that our trade with the Colonies was growing every year. Fifty years ago our whole export trade to the Colonies was less than £20,000,000, while last year it was £110,000,000, or five times as great, and this great expanse had taken place under free trade.

AN HON. MEMBER asked whether it did not occur to the hon. Gentleman that if we refused the offer of the Colonies they would enter into an alliance with other nations.

*MR. LOUGH said he denied that there was any offer from the Colonies. Such a thing as an offer ought to be made in a distinct and formal manner, and there was none such. The proposals of the Government had, in fact, plunged the Colonies into as great a turmoil as this country. The Colonial Secretary had produced some of the most commonplace arguments in support of protection. He suggested that workmen's trade unions were an infringement of free trade; he might just as well have said that a trade union among barristers interfered with the operations of free trade. The definition of free trade for the purposes of the controversy was perfectly simple; it was that the Government should not interfere with the trade relations between this and other countries. He had never heard a more preposterous statement than that made by the Colonial Secretary that we had not a weapon left in our hands to defend our trade interests against attacks from foreign countries. Our commerce was greater than that of any other nation in the world, both per head of the population and in total volume. How was it that so serious a crisis had arisen so suddenly, and why should it have been sprung upon the country? The best summary of the case had been given by the Under-Secretary of the Board of Trade, who stated that the whole agitation rested on the one point that the exports of this country were small and unsatisfactory compared with the imports. His case rested on three statements. First, that the exports were not of sufficient quantity, second, that they were not of the right quality, and third, that they did not go to the right destination. The problem was not properly answered by dealing with special trades. No doubt it was easy to select a particular trade and prove that it had failed. Trades constantly failed and free-traders never undertook to make all trades successful. Nor when we prove that a given trade is very successful do we meet the difficulty. Neither is it necessary to quarrel with Gentlemen opposite who select some particular year for their calculations. The right answer to the argument avoids all such side issues. What, then, is the proper answer to what may be called the Birmingham policy? If he might say so very respectfully the proper answer was that there was not a word of truth in the statements which had been made. Exports were not and could not be less than imports. Perhaps the matter can be more simply explained if I trace for a moment the origin of this fallacy. The idea that exports were smaller than imports perhaps arose in the Statistical Society where a paper was once read by a distinguished man on what he called "The Excess of Imports." There could be no excess of imports. Imports were like income or wealth; there could not be too much of them, and they were all advantageous if properly used. Then the matter was carried to its second stage by a distinguished statesman who arrived in this country from the Colonies. He heard the story that the imports of the country were excessive and he crystalised the situation as follows—

> "Yes, and we pay a hundred and sixty million sovereigns every year for this excess."

That remark excited ridicule throughout the country because we had not got a hundred and sixty million sovereigns to pay and even if it had it would not have met the difficulty because they were supposed to have been paying them annually for twenty years. Therefore, according to Mr. Seddon the country would require not a hundred and sixty million sovereigns but 3,000 million sovereigns. That was all nonsense. No sovereigns went out. Our money would not be accepted by the countries which sent the imports. The third and final stage of the fallacy was reached in one of the speeches of the Member for West Birmingham, who said—

> "Suppose all industrial enterprise in this country died out, that mills were stopped, that there was no work, so that the all people were idle, and that the country's ships went to the bottom of the sea, what would happen then?"

He said —

> "Then our imports would treble and the country would have to import to the value of £1,500,000,000!

What a statement to make! Probably no greater example of absurdity had ever been reached in the domain of human error. If our exports fell away to nothing then our imports would also disappear. My argument will be assisted if I give a simple definition of what exports are. Exports consist of material and services. That definition covered every form of export. But I will be asked if the matter is so simple as this, how is it so many people should have fallen into error? The answer is because they had made an improper use of the Government Blue-book, the Statistics, Abstract, and other publications of the Board of Trade. They assumed that complete information was furnished, but the story could not be found in any such documents, nor could a Government Department have prepared it. He was not attacking the Department when he called attention to the necessary limitations of their publications. If anyone would look up the story the Department gave of trade, he would find that the destination of exports and imports was not properly set out, the ports to and from which they were shipped only were given. Thus it appeared that Holland and Belgium sent this country a great deal more produce than they actually did. The Board of Trade specially warned readers as to this inaccuracy.. But the great defect was that the Blue-book gave no account of services. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said the best export was that which contained the least material and the most services. He would therefore, no doubt, be prepared to admit that the best export of all was that which contained no material and all services. What were those services? The first and greatest was the service of the country's shipping and that was entirely omitted from the Blue-book. There was the further service of building the ships which carried the nation's commerce to every part of the world, and that too ought to be regarded as part of the country's export. If such services were included they would not have these ridiculous statistics thrown at them. The late Colonial Secretary at Liverpool, looking at the fifty-five miles of quays in that most wonderful seaport, said—

> "I am accused of leaving out ships but I do not intend to leave them out. Our shipping is worth £90,000,000 sterling."

But he did not proceed to correct his fallacious statistics and include ships as part of the country's export. It was said during the debate that a large quantity of produce come from America and Russia and that this country sent nothing in return. This country, however, did 60 per cent. of the ocean carrying trade of America and 55 per cent. of the ocean carrying trade of Russia, and all the produce from those countries was paid for by the services which this country in that way rendered to them. Other services were enterprises carried on abroad. Those were export as much as anything else. An attempt was made to confuse the capital with the profits of such enterprises. That was not necessary. If he invested £1,000 in a Brazilian railway it might pay nothing, in which case it would not be an export; but if it paid £60 a year and if he brought that £60 back to this country in the form of coffee or wheat or other imports, then certainly it would be an export. Taking the definition of exports as given by the Member for West Birmingham, it would be found that the exports were equal to the imports and that this country sent out no money whatever. Exports might exceed imports, but it was impossible that the imports could exceed exports any more than water should ascend beyond its own level.

The second objection was that the exports were not of the right character, that there was not enough of manufacture in them. But it would be exceedingly difficult to maintain this position. What did hon. Gentlemen wish to send out? Was it more iron? or silk? or woollens? The commerce of this country had grown without any interference from the Government; the nation was exceedingly prosperous; and if exports in any given direction were increased without also increasing imports, the effect would be to displace something else. Did hon. Gentlemen opposite want to destroy the maritime supremacy of the country, or to displace British enterprises abroad? If they did they would meet with the greatest resistance. He did not believe that the House would interfere with the commercial liberty which the country had enjoyed so long. He believed the third objection was that we had too much commerce with foreign nations and not enough with the Colonies, but he had already dealt with this point and shown that our exports to the Colonies were steadily increasing, and any artificial interference with the progress of this business would tend to break up the colonial Empire altogether and endanger the colonial trade which was now in existence.

He turned for a moment to the argument of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade with reference to dumping. He did not think that this question had been fairly examined. The Member for West Birmingham had defined dumping and said that it took place when a country produced more of any commodity than it was able to consume, that then it could only get rid of the surplus by dumping it, and that Great Britain was the only country in which this dumping could take place. He had already spoken of one monstrous mistake the right hon. Gentleman had made, and he would only say now that if there could be a greater it would be the right hon. Gentleman's definition of dumping. Let the House consider it for a moment from the standpoint of a business with which he was familiar—the tea trade. Forty years ago no tea was produced within the Empire. It was all imported from foreign countries. Last year 325,000,000 lbs. of tea were grown in India and Ceylon, but the United Kingdom only consumed 250,000,000 lbs. What was done with the 75,000,000 lbs. that remained over? Why it was dumped. He had never heard anything so thoughtless as the statements with reference to this great branch of business. If dumping were a crime there was no nation in the world that committed it for such a long period as the British nation. It would be impossible to adopt any new principle with regard to dumping in a one-sided manner. If dumping were bad then this country's dumping abroad should be stopped; but if it were interfered with the country would get into difficulties of which hon. Gentlemen had no conception. We dumped 20,000,000 tons of coal abroad every year. We dumped our cottons, our woollens, our iron. We had done it for generations. According to the ex-Colonial Secretary dumping occurred when the country produced more than it could consume. Was the production, then, of every nation to cease when her own wants were supplied? Would France have to consume all the wines she produced? Were the fruit and spices of the East all to be consumed in the countries which produced them? Were the carpets of Persia all to be used in that country? All such suggestions were the foolish utterances of men totally unacquainted with trade. It was hardly an exaggeration to say that dumping was the foundation of English commerce, the palladium of our business freedom, and the man who interfered with it would be an enemy to his country.

He would now turn to the policy of retaliation which the Prime Minister had adopted. It had been stated that foreign nations had treated us with outrageous unfairness in raising up a wall of hostile tariffs against us, from which great injury had fallen on our commerce, but he would observe that there were two distinct features in the commercial ideas of foreign countries. In the first place the country which shut out our goods by tariff still wanted to trade with us, but they put on a high tariff to exclude some particular goods of ours. In the second place they only treated us in the same way that they treated every other country. And why should they not do that? If a country had the power why should it not shut out whatever goods it pleased? What was the effect of a high wall of tariff? The effect was that it oppressed their own people, and did not do us any harm, because whatever goods the foreign country sent over here they must accept payment for them in some other kind of goods from us. Their walls of tariff, then, only limited the power of selection on the part of their own people, and compelled them to take payment from us through some of the narrow channels which their governments still left open, which were more profitable to us than what they would select if the wider field had not been closed. The merchants of this country were not such fools as the Government supposed, they were able to protect their own interests and to secure that whatever the limitations protective systems might impose, profitable bargains were always made with the foreigner. Free trade was the best weapon to fight hostile tariffs. This weapon had served them well in the past, and if they stuck to it now it would serve them well in the future. Retaliation was the thin end of the wedge, and its adoption would inevitably lead to the broad system of protection. Let us examine the single experiment in retaliation which the Government have made. Nearly every Member of the Government who had spoken had mentioned the Sugar Convention as a good illustration of their successful interference with "dumping," and as an example of retaliation. The Sugar Convention Bill was an Act shaped on the ideas of the late Colonial Secretary. It had only been in operation some five months, and how had it effected already the consumption of sugar? Between 1902 and 1903 the consumption of sugar had fallen by 10 per cent. Sugar was the raw material of a good many commercial enterprises, and the fact that one-tenth of that trade had been destroyed by the action of the Government was an example of the folly into which the House had wandered. The Sugar Convention Bill was passed for the sake of the Colonies, and they were told that the effect of the measure would be that the export of sugar from the West Indies would be doubled and the decline of the industries of those islands would be arrested. As a matter of fact, in the year in which the Act had been carried into law the export of sugar from the West Indies was less than the previous year, for in 1902 the total was 1,200,000 cwts., whilst in 1903 the total was 700,000 cwts. Therefore they had not secured the end which they had been striving to obtain. They voted £250,000 as a free gift to the sugar industry, to keep it going until the Convention came into operation. What ought they to pay now when the Act had come into operation, and when they had given, what might prove, a final blow to the sugar industry of the West Indies? The great triumph of the Convention was to be the abolition of those noxious bounties which had depreciated the price of sugar below the cost of production. The moment the bounties ceased sugar was to advance 5s. per cwt., and the Government had adopted this policy regardless of the blow it would have given to British trade if their calculations had been correct. But what happened? The price of sugar had not advanced when the bounties were abolished, thus proving that their nature and effect had been entirely misconceived, and the whole enterprise, which culminated in the Sugar Convention Act, was a huge fatality. In the debate last year on this question the President of the Board of Trade said that if they gave protection to raw and refined sugar they would secure protection for sugared goods, and he said that if the Commission declared that sugared goods were not to be protected in the same way the Government would take immediate action when Parliament met. When the Commission met they stated that sugared goods were not in the same position, and refused the confectioners any protection, and this had struck a very severe blow at the confectionery industries of this country. This simple illustration was a proof that this House ought to hesitate before making any further experiment in the same direction.

There was one other aspect of this question of protection and free trade. They were too apt to forget what an important country Ireland was, and how deeply she was interested in those great experiments. The people of Ireland were suffering from the high price of sugar, and they were paying between £400,000 and £500,000 a year in extra taxation owing to the imposition of the sugar tax some two or three years since. Whatever they did in regard to these matters in this country Ireland had to bear her share of any loss or any mistakes they made. Looking back on the last century they could see the effect of both the policies on that unhappy country. Under fifty years of protection Ireland endured the greatest famine in her history. Then followed fifty years of free trade, during which her industries had been ruined and her population reduced to half, and now there was the keenest political discontent throughout the country. The fact was that whatever this Parliament did it could do no good to Ireland. Still, there was a standpoint from which hon. Members from Ireland could regard this question. Free trade meant fiscal freedom, but the idea of Colonial preference or any Imperial zollverein would lead us in an opposite direction. It was quite in accordance with the principles of free trade that Ireland should have the right to put on her own taxes, as the Channel Islands did. Ireland suffered very much under the 1s. corn duty, and, without saying that Ireland was very deeply interested in the fiscal question, he ventured to say that British protection offered no more advantages to Ireland than British free trade. On the contrary, the principles of free trade were more likely to be advantageous to Ireland than protection.

The concluding paragraph of this Amendment referred to the blessings of free trade. They were divided into three parts, which had been laid down by all the great apostles of free trade. In the first place the Government should not interfere with trade; in the second place the resources of the State should be found by direct taxation; and in the third place there should be strict economy in the services of the State. By direct taxation the burden could be laid fairly upon the rich, as well as the poor. The disadvantage of protection was that an undue proportion was pressed out of those who could least afford it. They had been told that foreign countries had adopted protection, and they had done it because it was a good means of wringing a large sum out of the people without knowing exactly how it was paid. Under free trade they saw how taxation was paid. The Government had failed in all three respects. They were the most extravagant Government the country had ever known; they relieved direct taxation instead of indirect taxation; and now they were trying to give the deadliest blow of all to the country by interfering with its commercial freedom. He appealed to free-traders opposite to stick to the principles which they had fought for in such a gallant manner and he was quite sure if they did this that victory would crown their efforts.

And, it being half-past Seven of the clock, the debate stood adjourned till this Evening's Sitting.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

"At the end of the Question, to add the words 'But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well being."—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside) said the question under discussion was so large that it was difficult to know where to begin, and, judging by the experience of previous speakers, it was equally difficult to know where to end. He would deal first of all with an argument which had been advanced in the course of the debate to the effect that if we changed our fiscal system we should discourage the efforts of those who in foreign countries were advocating the policy of free trade. Exactly the contrary had been urged in the Frankfurter Zeitung, which argued that it was the bad example of Germany which encouraged the present movement in England, and pleaded for a commercial treaty with England. With the statistics of the prosperity of Germany before them, however, it was manifest that such an argument must fall flat with the readers of the Frankfurter Zeitung. He had examined the trade statistics of Russia, Germany, Italy, Holland, France, and Belgium, and, taking the figures for 1890 and 1902, he found that in every case, with the solitary exception of Russia, those countries had increased their trade with us in manufactured goods, and we had decreased our trade with them. Taking 1890 and 1902, the first and last years for which the figures were available, he found that Germany in 1890 sent us £9,500,000 of manufactured goods, and we sent them £16,000,000; in 1902 they sent us £16,000,000, and we sent them £16,500,000, or a balance against us of £6,000,000. In the same way, between the same years the trade with Italy showed a balance against us of £1,250,000; with Holland (mostly German through trade), £6,750,000; with France, £7,250,000; with Belgium £7,750,000; and with the United States £20,000,000; or a total balance against us with these six countries of no less than £49,000,000. It was perfectly clear that with these facts before them all the wisdom of the professors would not avail with the people of Germany against the actual experience of their traders and merchants. The only means by which we could induce them to treat us more liberally was to play the same game. This fact showed the difference between ethics and economics; in ethics it was wrong to do evil that good might come, but in economics the only way to bring about true free trade was to indulge freely in retaliation.

So far as the productive character of a country was lessened, so far did it lose something of that energy and virility whereby alone it had been made and would continue to be great. An illustration of the truth of this statement was seen in the contrast between a manufacturing town and a watering-place, the one a town of producers and the other a town of consumers. Everyone connected with towns of that description would recognise that in the one there was an energy, corporate and individual, which was lacking in the other. Although the agencies of the distribution of wealth might be multiplied, still there was something inseparable from the productive character that we should be sorry to part with in our national life. He did not for a moment say that we had come yet to be a country of consumers, but there were ominous tendencies in that direction. He had seen statistics of employment, divided into industries, in which the numbers employed had decreased within late years, those in which the numbers employed had not increased in proportion to the population, and those which showed an increase in proportion to the population. The first category included agricultural labourers, clockmakers, hemp and jute makers, lead miners, silk workers, tin miners, tin-plate goods makers, and zinc workers; the second included chemical manufacturers, coal miners, dress industry, glass manufacturers, and textile fabrics; while the only trades included in the third category were books, prints and maps; engine and machine makers, fitters and boiler makers; food, lodging, tobacco, and drink; and houses, furniture, decoration, and building. These facts were somewhat significant. Those in the book trade were engaged in a strictly protected industry; machine makers largely made that which would subserve and increase industrial development abroad; boiler makers had great difficulty in exporting, owing to the bulk and shape of their products; those engaged in the industries connected with food and drink obviously could not export to any great extent; and the houses and building trades were protected by the circumstances of their occupation from the competitive importation of ready-made goods. Therefore, according to those statistics, of the actually productive staple industries of the country there was not one in which an increase was shown. And that must be the natural consequence when a home industry had neither the market at home to itself nor the free entrance to foreign markets, for the greater the flow of imports the less must be the employment at home.

No Member would wish as an ideal that we should be a nation of consumers only. As to the diplomatic aspect of the question, it would probably be admitted that when diplomacy was stripped of its conventional finesse it resolved itself into inducements or threats. In many instances the questions of difference between nations, while not of first-rate importance, were still of great importance to large sections of the community, and in such cases how could we proceed? What inducements had we to offer? To enter into an alliance, with its accompanying risks, for the sake of a purely trade advantage was not worth the game. To offer territory was to part with real property in exchange for a very doubtful and contingent advantage. The offer of cash down would not be tolerated by any Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it would be an inducement to every nation in the world to blackmail us. We could not offer trade advantages, as we had given them away already. Having, then, no inducements to offer, could we offer threats? To go to war for an ordinary trade advantage would be simply wicked and immoral. We could do nothing without the power of retaliation, which at present we did not possess. He would not confine this argument merely to cases of commercial advantage; it could be applied to questions of international importance not necessarily or exclusively connected with trade.

In our difference years ago with Portugal an allusion to Oporto wine would have had a potent effect; the Newfoundland Fisheries dispute might have been ended by a reference to champagne and silks; and there were conceivable circumstances in which mineral oil might be of considerable diplomatic service. But how should this power of retaliation be exercised? Statements had been made to the effect that it would be used only after Parliament had been consulted in each case. That was good as far as it went, but he would like to go further. The procedure on a Finance Bill or a Convention Bill was no more than the rest of the British Constitution—a good fighting machine. Just as in case of national emergency he would give the Executive Government power to raise and apply money without the previous consent of Parliament, so he would pass a general statute giving the Executive Government the power, within certain limits, to retaliate on its own responsibility, subject to the judgment of Parliament afterwards, against any country that treated us unfairly. In Germany the Government had not general or universal powers, but a restricted power of increasing or diminishing tariffs, which was subject to the judgment, not of the Reichstag, but of the Bundesrath only. When a country like Germany possessed such a power, surely we ought to allow our Government the use of a weapon equally prompt and effective, and not trust merely to the wisdom of this somewhat garrulous assembly. ["Oh!"]. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose had recently stated that the advocates of reform in this matter were acting on pure hypotheses. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that in Sheffield there was no hypothesis whatever about the matter. There was real and sore distress, partly accounted for by the fact that there had been some delay in the Government orders for armour-plate —a point to which he hoped the Civil Lord to the Admiralty would give some attention—but more largely due to circumstances which nothing but economic change could touch. It must necessarily be so when shafting made by his constituents ceased to find a market at the Tyne ports, because Germany by its cartel system was able to sell the same article at £3 per unit less. There was no sin in dumping itself. It was a perfectly legitimate commercial operation. But as a matter of business, if one side played at it the other should also. His ideal was that dumping should be stopped on both sides, but if we could not get an entrance into foreign markets we ought at least to keep command of our own. If he might venture a criticism on the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, he did not think his right hon. friend had quite explained how he would harmonise the conflicting claims of the revenue and the retaliatory tariff. Looked at simply for the purposes of revenue, the tariff would not be effective for retaliation against dumping; and, on the other hand, in the conceivable case of retaliating against all the world, next to no revenue would be brought in. That was a difficulty which deserved attention. His suggestion would be that the Government should put the highest revenue tax on foreign manufactured goods their experts advised; they would then have their revenue and machinery. Having their revenue and machinery they should then add, in case of necessity, duties on any particular articles in accordance with the needs of fiscal warfare. In reply to the objection that they would never know what revenue they were likely to get, he would say that they should calculate their revenue well within the mark and let the balance go to the sinking fund. But then this question arose: the policy of the Government was to open foreign markets; how would that affect industries which do not export, particularly agriculture? From the policy of negotiation and retaliation he did not think agriculture or other non-exporting industries could gain. Would it gain under the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? If, as was said in the case of the corn duty, the first shilling did not count, the only advantage to be secured was in the second shilling, and he did not think the addition of a shilling to the price of corn would make the difference between prosperity and depression. Therefore, as at present formulated, neither proposal met the difficulty. He thought the way out of the difficulty was indicated by Lord Salisbury some years, ago when he stated that exporting industries were suffering from foreign tariffs, while non-exporting industries were suffering from a home excise in the shape of rates. In the one case the remedy was to get rid of foreign tariffs, and in the other to reduce the rates.

Some critics had attacked the Government for proposing a revolution in the fiscal policy of the country. Although he disagreed with this he ventured to think that the proposals of the Government were not a small or insignificant part of the policy of fiscal reform. The proposals of the Government were good in themselves, and might be advocated and put into operation quite apart from any further measures. He remembered that during the discussions on the Finance Bill of 1902, he ventured to put forward views on fiscal policy which had since become more fashionable than they then were; for he found fault with it because it contained no retaliatory proposals. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen was kind enough to say that he had given a lucid exposition of exploded fallacies. He presumed the right hon. Gentleman still thought them fallacies but he must recognise that whether fallacies or not they had still considerable detonating power. The change had been such that nobody two years ago would have ventured to predict.

A good deal had been said against the attitude of the Prime Minister on this question. For his personal defence he needed no one but himself; but as a matter of speculation it was interesting to know what other course his critics would have had him take. Was he to anathematise the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and all his works? If so, he would have been unfair to his own convictions, because he went with the right hon. Gentleman at least half the way. Was he to accept the new policy wholesale, and make it his own? If so, he would have been open to the charge of committing his Party, unprepared and unsuspicious, to a revolution of which no man could see the end. Was he, again, to resign his post and acknowledge himself overcome by the stress of the situation? If so, he would have been false to the trust which a united Party had unanimously committed to him a year before. Another course was possible to him, to accept the necessity for fiscal change, to determine the time and the measure of its application, according to a sense of what was practicable for Parliament and expedient for the State, and to hold together his Party for work, for reform, and for conservation in other regions of no less importance than the fiscal sphere. This the Prime Minister had done, and, in so doing, he believed he would be followed by the very great majority of his supporters with a loyalty which difficulties and calumny would make the more staunch and the more enduring.

The Government had been asked not only to declare their policy but also the actual details and methods by which they wished to carry their policy out. It had been said that it would not be very long before they had a General Election, and therefore he presumed that the Opposition also had a policy. What did they propose in regard to education? He did not know whether the solitary representative of the Opposition Front Bench would like a little cross-examination upon that. [Cries of "Yes," and an HON. MEMBER, There is only one on the Government Bench.] The Opposition ought to be prepared to state how they would carry out a reform in the financial system of the country. Would the hon. Member in charge of the Front Opposition Bench be prepared to stand a cross-examination as to how they proposed to carry out their education policy? Did they propose to restore the School Boards, buy up the Voluntary Schools, or take them over without paying for them, and give secular instruction in all schools? His point was that the questions he had just put to the Opposition were no more unreasonable than the questions put to the Government as to how they were going to carry out their proposals in regard to fiscal reform. He feared that some of his friends forget that forty years passed from the time when first an agitation for free trade sprung up till the time when it was consummated under the treaty of 1860. They had to deal with what to many Englishmen had become a religion, and they could not drive religious convictions, even though they be based on ancient superstition. But that the change must come, and that it need not be feared, he was equally convinced. People talked sometimes as though, before free trade, England was a poor country of mean account; but our shipping supremacy was created by the Navigation Act of a Republican Government, our wealth (according to Sir R. Giffen) trebled between 1750 and 1800, and our credit, under another fiscal system, brought us triumphant through the strain of the great wars. It was true that by the middle of the last century the old system had done its work and could no longer stand; but the success of that which followed was aided by a rare combination of events and sentiment with which it became associated in the public mind, or the results of which it usurped in the popular tradition. It was synchronous with great discoveries of gold and a marvellous development of applied science. Again, it represented triumph over the landed interest, and the landed interest was not popular in the towns. Those who opposed it had opposed the Reform Bill, and it was therefore associated with democratic principles, a conjunction which all subsequent experience had shown to be fortuitous. Above all, the age in which it was passed was an age of illusions. Peace, brotherhood, the reduction of armaments, the decay of national sentiment, and rivalries were looked on as the natural fruit of diffused knowledge and extended communications. Now racial hatreds are everywhere stimulated, national rivalries are more bitter than before, armaments are multiplied on every hand. For our material defences they had learned their lesson. He trusted that in the economic sphere as well they would recognise the truth, that if we wanted peace we must be prepared for war.

*SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said the junior hon. Member for Oldham, whose speech gave so much pleasure to all who heard it, gave credit to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham for courage and belief. No man in this House failed to recognise the courage of the right hon. Gentleman, and they gave him full credit for belief in his own doctrines. He, however, had come to the conclusion that there was but little foundation for that belief, and he had arrived at this decision after reading the ex-Colonial Secretary's speeches and criticisms upon them. The familiar case of the tin-plate trade had been blown into atoms, upon the highest possible authority, by Sir John Jones Jenkins, who had shown that in 1902 the tinplate trade showed the largest amount of business ever known in the history of the trade. Sir John Jones Jenkins explained that it was only the old-fashioned tin-plate works which were at a standstill, and that in the United States the rise in the price of tin-plates caused by the tariff had cost them so much that it would have paid the country better to have paid the cost of those works and pensioned all the work-people off at full wages. The right hon. Gentleman had also told them that the average price of wheat in the ten years following the repeal of the Corn Laws was higher than the average price of the three preceding years. This self-appointed teacher was not aware that the Act of 1846 decreed that the new duty should not come into operation until February, 1849. Therefore he took the years 1847 to 1856, as the ten years following repeal, including two years under the old duties and two years at 70s. a quarter, during the Crimean War. Again the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham told his audience at Newcastle-on-Tyne that the alkali trade of that neighbourhood had been ruined by foreign competition. This trade was carried on by two methods, one employing sulphur, and the other ammonia, both invented in France in 1808. After many experiments it was then decided that the sulphur process was the best, because sulphur was the more easy to obtain. This process was rapidly developed in England and many fortunes were made by it. In 1861, however, a distinguished Belgian started again the ammonia process, and after experimenting with it for ten years he succeeded with his process and in 1873 made 2,600 tons of alkali. The process thereafter underwent an enormous development, with the result that last year the amount of alkali produced by it had risen to 1,610,000 tons, while the total output of the sulphur process, the one worked at Newcastle, declined, during the same period from 525,000 tons to 150,000 tons. Was that due to foreign competition? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham did not know even the A B C of this trade, and to attempt, by legislation, to stop such a process was like trying to legislate against last year's rain. He had come to the conclusion that the Member for West Birmingham was not a safe guide with regard to the position of certain specific trades. What were really the reasons why some trades were languishing in this country? One of the reasons was that the works in which the business was carried on were old-fashioned. There were trades which were seriously injured (he had no hesitation in saying in the presence of friends of his who represented organised labour), by the old-fashioned ways of some of the trades unions. Just as the plant in some works was old-fashioned, so the trades unions were old-fashioned if they limited the out-put and drove hard bargains with employers as to new designs, if they unduly limited the number of apprentices, or limited mechanical appliances.

Before they descended to such a method as protective duties, at least let the employers and the employed meet together in a friendly fashion and set their house in order. He was an employer in the wire trade, one sympathetically but mistakenly dealt with by the Member for West Birmingham, and he knew that it was suffering from a lack of courage on the part of the employers and consideration on the part of the employees. He hoped that before long employers and employed would meet together in that trade also to see if anything could be done to the mutual advantage of both. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said that under a system of protection they would have greater steadiness of employment. The right hon. Gentleman had proved the contrary by his own statements. What was it that had produced trouble in the tinplate trade but an import duty—not a duty imposed in this country but in another. Impose duties in this country and they would produce violent charges just as duties imposed in another country had done. The first imposition of a tariff, and every change in a tariff, brought upon one trade or another some derangement. The steadiness of employment was less in every protected country than in our own. He had spoken of one cause why some of our trades were languishing, but there was another known as "rule of thumb" management.

He had heard of a woollen mill in Yorkshire, where on one floor the foreman had unlimited power of ordering a certain chemical, while the foreman on the floor below had unlimited power of ordering another chemical which counteracted the one above. The same traveller sold both. Not one of the directors knew why either chemicals was used. He remembered having a conversation with a soap manufacturer, a customer of his own. He coaxed the customer to tell him how much soap he had turned out in the previous six months and found that only one-third of the alkali supplied had gone out of his factory in the shape of soap. He recommended him to find out where the other two-thirds had gone. That gentleman discovered that it had gone down a sewer through a broken pipe. That was one instance of "rule of thumb." His own firm once got a claim from a glassmaker, who said that his glass was ruined by the amount of sulphur in the alkali sold to him. The hon. Member knew there was no sulphur in the alkali, and he paid a visit to the glassworks. He succeeded in getting a sample of baryta which was being used there, and he sent it to the public analyst of Newcastle-on-Tyne for analysis. It was found to be sulphate of baryte, instead of carbonate of baryta, as it should have been. Hence those tears. Naturally no more was heard of the claim.

Sir John Brunner.

Reference had been made in the course of the debate to the making of electrical machinery. It was the fashion now to be in favour of scientific education, but it was not so twenty years ago. A great blow came then upon the trade of making electrical machinery. By the Electric Lighting Act of 1882, any person who established an electric lighting installation in a town was bound, at the end of twenty-one years, to hand it over to the authorities of the town without any addition to the price for good-will or prospective profit. No business man in his senses, undertaking a new and risky business, would trade on such terms. The author of the Act was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Only a fortnight ago he heard of a case which afforded an illustration of how English trade got behind. It had been behind, but it was recovering. An Englishman, resident in one of the British colonies, found in the neighbourhood of his factory a plant which was likely to to produce a new dye. He sent a specimen to a correspondent in England, and that correspondent sent it to the Colonial Institute, with the view of ascertaining whether anything could be made of it. The authorities of the Institute said they never examined anything except for the Colonial Office. The English correspondent sent the specimen to a well-known firm of chemical manufacturers in Germany, the firm which was now threatening India with the absolute loss of the trade in indigo. They produced a new dye from it and that dye had been registered in the joint names of the German company and the English correspondent. The House remembered very well how, not long ago, a number of deaths were caused from the drinking of beer containing arsenic. In a trial just finished the names of two firms had been mentioned—one of whom made sulphuric acid containing arsenic and the other used the acid in making glucose for brewers. That trial had brought to light an appalling ignorance on the part of these firms, which was a shame to the chemical trade. He was glad that the English firm who manufactured sulphuric acid should have been excused from any allegation of fraud, but their ignorance was absolutely appalling.

The causes of slackness I have spoken of are all removable causes. As showing the disadvantages of the protective system the hon. Member mentioned the case of an American inventor who introduced into England a machine by which matches were made without the intervention of hand labour from the time the blocks of wood were put in until they came out as finished matches. In England, matchmaking by that process was now a most prosperous trade, and the company was paying large dividends. The same machine was tried in Germany. It could only be used with a particularly soft wood, and none suitable was to be found within the limits of the Zollverein. The duty on the wood introduced from other quarters was so high that it was absolutely impossible to make the matches in Germany. He could give another illustration from the soap trade in Canada. His friend, Mr. Lever, had a soap factory in the colony, and he wanted to use cotton seed oil for making soap. All soap materials there were duty free, but cotton seed oil was not on the list. The other soap manufacturers did not want to use cotton seed oil and they took measures to prevent it being put on the list. That was an example of the lobbying that took place under protection.

The noble Lord, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs said that a free trade Government could do nothing for trade. Those who thought so were totally mistaken. The United States, 100 years ago, determined that the improvement of harbours and rivers should not be left to the locality, and should not be left undone because of the poverty of a locality. One Government in Europe after another had done great things to help trade, and in a thoroughly wholesome fashion, by reducing the cost of the internal transit of goods, the cost of the receipt of goods at ports, and the cost of loading. They were told that no practical recommendation came from the Opposition side; he submitted this one to his own leaders. The fruitful cause of protective duties was extravagant expenditure. He threw back in the teeth of any man the imputation that he was a Little Englander.

MAJOR SEELY (Isle of Wight) said the hon. Baronet who had just sat down had shown clearly from practical experience how very much greater were the influences of scientific invention and co-operation between employers and employed, and other factors, than the factor of import duties upon trade. In that matter he struck at the root of the question which was agitating the country and the House as to whether, after all, import duties could help us in any way whatever. He was sure that hon. Members, free traders or free importers, were grateful to the Secretary for the Colonies for the speech he had made that day. The right hon. Gentlemen said, suppose you place an import duty of 5 or 10 per cent. for revenue purposes and you find, incidentally, it has a helping effect on the home producer or to the Colonies, are you to say it is a protective duty and you are to have none of it? He ventured to say, Yes. The Colonial Secretary had described free traders as being fanatics and ascetics in this cause. Frankly, he confessed that he was a fanatic or an ascetic, because he believed that any tax which had a protective effect was a tax which this country would do wisely to forswear. He had been impelled to the belief that protective taxes, whether small or large, whether involving colonial preference or not, contained so great and manifold evils that he for one would never be a party to their imposition. [OPPOSITION cheers.] Although the holding of this belief might drive him from the ranks of the Conservative Party, still he adhered to that decision. Anyone who proposed to take the grave step of voting against the Government ought to give some reason why he held this faith so strongly. He had already stated his objection to agree to a tax which would help the home producer, although imposed for revenue only. He cited the case of the working man who lived under the two systems. The working man at present went to a shop to buy sugar and other articles. He was aware that he was spending 6d. more than he need spend if there were no taxes at all. But the working man said to himself, "I know that the Army and Navy are necessary, and I am willing to pay my share." Under the system suggested by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham the working man, in buying his necessaries, would be aware, not only that he was paying 6d. more, but he would now say, "A portion of the 6d. goes towards the Army and the Navy, but a portion also goes to provide Messrs. Jones and Robinson, the owners of the factory, with more money to employ more footmen and drink more champagne." And the working man would speak the absolute truth.

He agreed that the economic loss of wealth to the people of the country was very slight, because much of the money gained by the manufacturer would be distributed among his workpeople, but no one could deny that the man who paid protective taxes had a definite grievance. No one would also deny that the system under which we lived did produce a greater degree of social content than prevailed in any other country; and though he believed that while the economic loss suffered by protection was greatly exaggerated by free trade speakers, yet the social evils of protection had received nothing like sufficient attention. A country which had adopted free trade and reverted to protective duties, however small, must do one of two things. It must either transfer the people to great countries with illimitable resources, like America, or it must have a military despotism such as prevailed on the Continent. He might be wrong in that belief, but at least it was a belief by greater authorities than himself. Taxes could not in any case be a source of wealth, and experience had proved that they could not transfer wealth from one country to another by putting on taxes. As countries could not tax one another, a Government had then to consider in what way they should put a tax on the people of their own country, on which class, and for the benefit of what other class. Now they came to the crux of the case, and the cause of all the agitation in the country. Were they going so to put on their taxes that part of them should be taken out of the pockets of the producers and the consumers, and put partly into the coffers of the State and partly into the pockets of another class of consumers and producers, or were they going to continue the principle under which we had lived for the last sixty years, that money taken out of the pockets of the general public should go straight into the coffers of the State? He for one adhered to the view that it was wiser to stick to the plan of taxation for revenue purposes only, and he would ask his right hon. friend the Colonial Secretary whether he believed it possible to pledge his Government that they would, under no circumstances, except for purely temporary and combative purposes, impose any restrictive duties of any sort or kind on foreign manufactures?

*MR. LYTTELTON: The policy of retaliation does not prescribe the imposition of import duties on any class of commodities except for defensive purposes.

MAJOR SEELY said he was glad to hear from his right hon. friend a definite pledge that it was no part of the policy of His Majesty's Government, that they had no intention now, nor at any future time, before or after any election, to put import duties of any sort or kind, except as a purely temporary expedient, upon foreign manufactured goods.

*MR. LYTTELTON: My hon. and gallant friend has no right, after asking a question and receiving an answer, to make a speech, and put into my answer that which it did not contain.

MAJOR SEELY said he was sorry if he had misinterpreted his right hon. friend's view, but the matter was of so much importance, for it really embodied the whole question at issue. Might he ask him what was the position of His Majesty's Government? [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] It was apparent that His Majesty's Government could not possibly give that pledge, because their supporters had practically unanimously applauded every speech, every statement, of the Secretary to the Board of Trade when he pointed out that the imports of certain classes of foreign goods had deprived the working classes of £5,000,000 of wages. He excepted from this remark those who had remained firm to their free trade principles, although many had been half driven from them by some leaders of the Party, and many others had been misled. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had said that it was possible by a system of import duties to give 300,000 poor families in this country, who had been deprived of their work by the importation of foreign goods, 30s. a week. If there was one germ of truth in it, what an illimitable hope it held out to all these people who were struggling on the verge of poverty, and who thought that they saw by this method a relief from all their troubles! The true division was between those who believed that the exclusion of imports would, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham contended, give wealth to those who had no wealth, and employment to those who sought it, and could not find it, and those who, like himself, held that that was an idle dream. He asked his right hon. friend whether the Government would pledge themselves to the view that it was idle and absurd to suppose that relief from all their troubles could be obtained by import duties, and he could get no answer. He did not blame the Colonial Secretary, but from his right hon. friend's speech, and from that of the Secretary to the Board of Trade, it could be seen that they did believe that relief from the troubles of the poor was to be found in the imposition of import duties and taxes. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had deluded himself and the people of this country, with the best and most patriotic motives no doubt, into the belief that relief would come from taxation, then they must oppose his proposals by every means in their power, so that other greater reforms might not be swept aside, and so that bitter disappointment might not render our people more miserable than before. If it were true that any relief from suffering could be obtained from the imposition of import duties, then for Heaven's sake let the Government come forward with it at once. Let the Secretary to the Board of Trade, who had told them that £5,000,000 were abstracted from the pockets of Englishmen, stand forward at once like a man and say that he and his colleagues would put an end to these sorrows and troubles. He honestly believed that the hon. Gentleman sincerely believed it; but the hon. Gentleman could not say so—and why not? In order to keep the Party together! He did not wish to say anything unkind, but he could not be a party to trifling with the deep feelings that had been aroused, and honestly aroused, on both sides in this matter. He was firmly convinced that all this protectionist talk was nothing but folly and an idle dream. For his own part no talk of retaliation, or of holding the Party together, would induce him to support a Party which held that idle dream, and he would unhesitatingly vote and would urge upon his friends not to doubt for a moment, but to vote also for the Amendment, which represented their opinions of the truth.

*MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanarkshire, Partick) said that there was no section of the House which felt more deeply than those who agreed with the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the loss from which the House suffered by his absence from this debate. They felt how much that absence prejudiced the cause in which they were interested. But there was one thing they thoroughly appreciated, and that was the generous sympathy which the House had shown for the cause of that absence, and the friends of the right hon. Gentlemen would not soon or lightly forget the deep and true feeling which inspired the phrases of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose when he informed the House of the cause of the absence of the opponent and friend with whom he had hoped to cross swords in this great arena. Such words leave a mark, not to be obliterated by the dints or the dust of the keenest party controversy. They had heard a very striking speech from the Colonial Secretary, with every word of which he thoroughly agreed. As one of his earliest friends in this House, he hoped he would be permitted to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on that speech, which showed to the world what his friends had long known, how fit he was to be the occupant of the great office he now held. But there was another speech upon which a vast deal of emphasis had been laid by those opposed to the Government on that side of the House and on this, and that was the speech of the President of the Board of Trade. Those who were opposed to the Government were inclined to take that speech as a final and permanent definite declaration of policy, but to his mind it was nothing of the kind. He took it simply as an interim report—an explanation of the present policy of the Government, together with the personal opinions of the right hon. Gentleman who spoke it. The President of the Board of Trade had rightly declined to state the future policy of the Government, and he quoted as an unanswerable precedent the action of Mr. Gladstone. In due time and at a future time the policy of the Government would be put before the country, and it would be on higher authority—the authority of the Prime Minister himself, who, with all respect to the President of the Board of Trade, was a higher authority than he was. He must say that he could not accept the system of successive General Elections which had been expounded by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. That was taking a great deal too many bites to the cherry. It was not in the power of anyone to say what the issues at the next General Election would be. These issues would form themselves, and no declaration now could hinder the Prime Minister or the Party from going to the country on the larger policy of Imperial consolidation, and preference to the Colonies if and when it seemed expedient to them to do so. The Prime Minister very rightly in his speech at Sheffield reserved his freedom on that point, and they, his followers, declined to take any limitation on that except from himself. It seemed to him that the line which the President of the Board of Trade had taken was a false line, it was open to attack from the free trade side and it was open to an acceptance which was just as damaging. It admitted too much, and reminded him of the excuse of the servant girl who, when an unfortunate baby appeared, said "Please, sir, it was only a very little one." That was an excuse which would not carry any weight. In view of the declaration of the President of the Board of Trade, what became of the great Sheffield speech of the Prime Minister and the solemn questions which were asked in it? The Prime Minister said—

> "The second question I will imagine put to me is this—'Do you desire to reverse the fiscal tradition, to alter fundamentally the fiscal tradition which has prevailed during the last two generations?' Yes, I do. I propose to alter that tradition by asking the people of this country to reverse, to annul, to delete altogether from their book of maxims of public conduct the doctrine that you must never put on taxation except for revenue purposes."

Mr. Parker Smith.

Then as to liberty of negotiation the Prime Minister said—

> "Will the remedy you propose be complete? It will not be complete even if tried in its integrity, because the country will not tolerate the taxation of food."

Was the whole answer to these questions to be that the Government wished to have the power, after obtaining the concurrence of the House of Commons, to use retaliation? That was not enough, as the outcome of such a speech. Mountains would have been in labour and have brought forth a very small mouse indeed. If the principle of freedom of negotiation were accepted, as it appeared to be on that side of the House, he asked why not proceed with it at once? It was said by the ultra-fiscal purists that retaliation was impossible, that it might lead to a tariff war. Of course it might, but so might any diplomatic negotiation lead to war, and it was the business of diplomatists to avoid that. The same was true in regard to fiscal negotiation. He denied the assertion that it made no difference in negotiating treaties, whether we had a power of retaliation or not. He would like to read an extract on this point from Mr. Morley's "Life of Cobden." In defending the policy of the French Treaty of 1860, Mr. Morley said—

> "It is absurd to quarrel with the treaties because they do not sound in time with the verbal jingle of an abstract dogma. It is beside the mark to meet the advantages gained by the international action of commercial treaties by the formula 'Take care of your imports and your exports will take care of themselves.' The decisive consideration is that we can only procure imports from other countries on the cheapest possible terms upon the condition that producers in those countries are able to receive our exports on the cheapest possible terms. Foreign producers can only do this on condition that their Governments can be induced to lower hostile tariffs; and foreign Governments are only able, or choose to believe that they are only able, to lower tariffs in face of the strength of the protected interests by means of a commercial treaty."

He wished to give a further instance. He met the other day a gentleman who was concerned in drawing up the McKinley Tariff, who gave him a most graphic description of proceedings when that tariff was being drawn up. Article after article was discussed by the Tariff Committee, and the amount of duty to be imposed upon it. On one article the expert adviser of the Committee said "Be careful; remember 90 per cent. of this article comes from Germany; put on a low tariff." A low tariff was accordingly imposed. On another article it was said "Three-fourths of these goods come from France; you must not put the duty too high, for France can meet you." The duty was fixed accordingly. Another article came forward, when it was said "Oh, this article comes from England, do what you like with it." That was the style in which foreign countries dealt with a country which could not defend itself. There was another instance, and it was contained in the Blue-book on India issued the other day. In this Blue-book the views of the Government of India on the question of preferential tariffs were set forth and they stated that so far as they could see at present such a policy would not suit them. But they gave a variety of cases in which the Government policy, the policy of negotiation, had actually been used in India, and where the tariff used as a weapon against foreign countries in tariff negotiations had been of immediate and great value to the people of India.

The right hon. Baronet the Member for Northumberland (Berwick) had challenged them to cite a single instance in which the power of retaliation had been used with satisfactory results. Well, he would give them some from this Blue-book. In the year 1900 France proposed to submit imports from India to the higher or general tariff. More recently Russia threatened to raise her already exorbitant duty on Indian tea following the passing of the Sugar Convention Bill. In the former case the Indian Government were able, by the grant of a small tariff concession in favour of vinegar and copperas, to secure most-favoured-nation treatment, and to escape the almost penal enhancement to which their coffee and pepper would otherwise have been subject. In the Russian case the Government of India advised the Secretary of State that they would be prepared to impose a differential duty on Russian petroleum. "In both cases," it was stated in the Blue-book, "negotiation was rendered possible by the fact that India possesses an import tariff," and was ready in case of need to differentiate against the goods of other countries, the Governments of which assumed a hostile attitude.

THE MASTER OF ELIBANK (Edinburgh, Midlothian): What had they lost in Ceylon over the Russian case?

*MR. PARKER SMITH: Ceylon has nothing in the world to do with it.

THE MASTER OF ELIBANK: But what have the planters lost?

*MR. PARKER SMITH objected to these irrelevant interruptions. He was stating the case of India, and was proving from the Blue-book which had been quoted from by the other side on points favourable to them, that the Government of India had in the last few years reaped advantage from the very policy which the Home Government were claiming liberty to use, and which it had been asserted by hon. Members opposite it could not under any possible circumstances be of advantage to any Government to have. Indeed the Indian Government declared that in their opinion a greater freedom of policy would be attended by beneficial results, for they went on to say that if Japan were made to understand that the Indian Government were free when necessary to differentiate against foreign countries it would be possible to get better terms from the Japanese Government than had hitherto been the case. Thus they had three concrete instances of the advantages gained by the possession of these additional powers. But there was a great deal more beyond. He frankly confessed that it seemed to him there was no line of demarcation in this matter. Once accept the principle of using tariff for other purposes than revenue only and a great many other things must follow.

It was said long ago by Adam Smith that defence was more important than opulence. Now-a-days there were many things more important than opulence, and we wanted freedom to use the tariff in order to obtain them. The country would be asked for a full and deliberate mandate to use the tariff for political purposes, to obtain employment and a higher class of employment for the people, and to draw the parts of the Empire closer together—to bring the Colonies into closer union with ourselves. This undoubtedly meant preference, a duty on manufactures, a general tariff, a tax on food. He was not afraid of going with these views to the country when the country had had time fully to understand them. There were of course many difficulties to be faced, and some of them had been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. Much elaborate negotiation would be involved, much adjustment in favour of one Colony or another corresponding to what the Colonies were willing to give us. The right hon. Gentleman had asked would it be a fair bargain to allow colonial imports to come here free while our exports were taxed. But how did that differ from the present condition of affairs? Only in so far as that was the state of things with foreign countries as well as with the Colonies. They can all send their goods here free while we on our part had to pay duties on those we sent them. The worst that could be argued against the proposal for preference, then, was that the Colonies would be in the same position as foreign countries were in. He regretted that the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had minimised unduly the capacity and willingness of our Colonies to meet us, but if after all we could not make a bargain with them we should be very much as we were. Free trade within the Empire—which was what we were hoping for in the future—might be far out of reach now; but was not the path to a union of that kind through closer arrangements with the Colonies? The influence of the Zollverein on German unity had not been sufficiently appreciated by the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich who did not appear to realise all that it had to do in leading up to the Union of the German Empire. German historians and economists placed great stress upon it and upon the public spirit of Prussia in entering into agreements with the smaller scattered States—separated not by the sea which united but by the land which divided—and in standing without scruple the great pecuniary loss thereby involved for a long time, they held that these bold sacrifices and this Fiscal Policy led up to the consolidation of the German Empire. Two other parallels were quoted by the noble Lord—the cases of the Union with Scotland and Ireland—and he drew from them the conclusion that in these matters fiscal interest counted for very little. He himself took an opposite view. The Union with Scotland took place in 1707, and at the time there was a strong feeling against it which was only overcome by the fact that the Union meant prosperity and fiscal advantage to Scotland. What better witness could they have of that than Sir Walter Scott, who, by the mouth of Bailie Nicol Jarvie describes how the strong feeling against the Union was overcome when it was discovered that by admission to the West Indian and Virginian trade Scotland gained wealth, prosperity, and happiness. That was the manner in which cordiality was created between the two countries. But how was it that with regard to Ireland the exact contrary was the case? There the Union was brought about on political grounds—grounds absolutely sufficient as he thought—but unfortunately England's fiscal policy proved absolutely destructive to the material interests of Ireland. No one would deny that the policy of free trade, however advantageous to England, was ruinous to Ireland in the middle half of the last century, and he feared that the fact that adversity instead of prosperity to Ireland being the result of that financial policy was responsible for the continuance till the present day of the feeling against the Union. Had the Union made Ireland financially prosperous in the same way as it did Scotland, the feeling against it would assuredly have died out by now.

Another argument which had been brought forward was in connection with the old Corn Laws. But nobody in their senses wanted to go back to the Corn Law policy of sixty years ago. Those Corn Laws were an absolute and hopeless blunder. That view was held by the most scientific protectionists, the German school, who had put the theory on a sound basis. But the Corn Laws were but a small and unimportant factor in the condition of the country. The real contest in the free trade controversy of sixty years ago lay between the manufacturing interest and the agricultural interest; and it was political passion that had given an exaggerated importance to the Corn Laws. They were perfectly unnecessary and led to extravagant prices in bad times without keeping the prices steady in good years, when they were inclined to fall too low. Cobden, in 1842, said the Free Trade movement was a middle-class agitation. He complained that the intelligent mechanics stood aloof, and the Chartists were hostile and suspicious. It was the great capitalist class who formed the basis of the anti-Corn Law movement, because they felt that their order was at stake. It was a false idea altogether that the growth of this country in the last fifty years was owing solely to free trade, confined to those whose knowledge of history is only derived from political books and pamphlets. People forget that in the period immediately preceding steam had come into general use and that there had been an absolute change in our whole system of commerce. Adam Smith writing not much more than a century ago told them how in those days it took six weeks to carry a load of four tons by road from Edinburgh to London and back, while it took an equal period to take 200 tons the same distance by sea. Since then there had been an enormous and unparalled extension. Adam Smith told them also that the growth of population constituted the most decisive mark of a country's prosperity. Well, in the first half of the nineteenth century the population of Great Britain increased faster than it had ever done either before or since. In the forty years from 1800 to 1841—a period which the right hon. Gentleman opposite said was one absolutely miserable and wretched, the population of the United Kingdom increased by 65 per cent., and in the forty years 1851 to 1891—he left out the period of the potato famine—the increase was only 38 per cent. If they left Ireland out of consideration, and if they took Great Britain alone the increase in the first forty years was 70 per cent. and in the second period 60 per cent. Those were the days when the doctrine of laisser faire prevailed in all directions, growth was chaotic, and vast towns were springing up while there were not in existence sanitary or factory laws. It was the novels of the period that gave the truer picture of the state of the country. They had been referred by Mr. Morley to novels, and especially to those of Mr. Disraeli and Mrs. Gaskell. Let them read those and they would find that the most burning questions of that day, were not as to the dear loaf. They would remember the case of the old lady in "Sybil" who, when told she needed the cheap loaf, replied that the difficulty was she had no money to buy it with. The grievances dwelt upon were in connection with the Truck system and the repeated strikes, and they arose, too, from the wild and uncontrolled action of trades unions, as well as from the loss of employment from time to time, owing to the uncertain condition of trade. In "Sybil" the worst grievance is put thus—

> "We don't see enough of our young Queen's head, for we are not paid in money but in waistcoats."

That was also the kind of grievance described by Mrs. Gaskell, who had an intimate acquaintance with the condition of the people of Manchester. The distress during the period of the corn laws was caused not so much by the high price of bread as by the reaction from the war and the distress which followed on it, and by the rotten poor law which existed at the time and which encouraged men to believe they could prosper as well without as with employment. Then, too, there was the change going on from the staple agricultural condition to the industrial state of civilisation. Everybody was entering into fresh employment under conditions that were absolutely chaotic. These changes in the social system meant friction and much suffering, and of that they had an illustration in connection with the west of Scotland. The thriving textile industry of that district failed and was gradually transferred to Lancashire and other parts of the country. The great mineral industries sprang up to take its place, but the change which occurred during the time that it was going on led to very great distress. But was it fair or honest to exploit those memories of old bitterness and to pretend that a duty less than a tenth of the amount of the old corn tax could have in the slightest degree the effect which the old tax had. It was the old story of giving a dog a bad name and hanging him. But it was just as unfair to give oneself a good name when it was not deserved. That seemed to him to be what the Free Food League was doing. They were using a name which was entirely foreign to their doctrines, principles and operations, and which was absolutely incorrect in itself and calculated to mislead. They were trading under a fraudulent name.

That seemed to him to be beyond the legitimate sphere of political warfare. When it was pointed out to the Duke of Devonshire he admitted that the name might be incorrect and somewhat misleading, but that it did not matter. He himself did not think that that was an adequate way of dealing with such a misrepresentation. The Free Food League meant that food was to be had free. To be accurate the name of the League should be "The Free From Protective Taxes Food League." There was no justification in using a name which was liable to misunderstanding, and to which the persons using it had no right.

The President of the Board of Trade gave it as his personal view that it would not be wise for the country to adopt the new fiscal policy. That might or might not be true at the present time, but he did not consider that the right hon. Gentleman gave any strong reason in support of his contention. He said that the effect of protection would practically be to put a tax on the consumer for the benefit of the producer. He himself did not consider that protection could be justified when it imposed a tax on the consumer for the benefit of the producer; but that it was to be justified when it imposed a tax for the benefit of the country at large. The best and soundest form of protection was protection by which no money was raised at all. Take the case of carpets in the United States. Before the McKinley Tariff there was a very large export of carpets to the United States. The McKinley Tariff put on a very heavy duty, with the result that a certain kind of carpet ceased to be imported into the United States. What happened? According to the arguments of hon. Gentlemen opposite the price of carpets ought to have gone up, and the consumers should have suffered; but the price did not rise at all; it remained exactly the same. The only difference was that the carpets were made in the United States instead of in Scotland, and that the workmen in the United States, as well as the manufacturers, had the whole benefit instead of the Scottish manufacturer and Scottish workman. That was an example of successful protection which increased employment to the benefit of the country at large. He thought hon. Gentlemen who differed from them on the question, should at least give them the credit for being concerned for the interests of the country at large, not for the interests of individual industries. It was not well for hon. Gentlemen to assume that all the virtue was on their own side if they wanted to understand what really was the position of their opponents. The view taken by the free importers was the view of those English political economists who thought only of the interests of the individuals composing the nation, and who assumed that what was good for the individual would be necessarily good for the nation as a whole. That did not follow at all. The view entertained in Germany and other countries where the principle of protection obtained was, that the interests of the nation were to be considered in preference to those of the individual, that if employment were encouraged it would be a general advantage to the country, and that by protection fresh employment was created, from which further wealth and prosperity followed both for the nation and for its individual members. There were two kinds of imports, namely, the labour causing imports and the labour displacing imports. All countries welcomed imports that caused labour, but imports which displaced labour were on a different footing altogether, and did harm to the country which imported them. The additional cheapness gained was small, but the loss in employment was very great. That was the only reasonable view to take. The English school of economists assumed that fresh employment could always be found if labour were displaced by imports, but that was a mere assumption, though it was the fundamental postulate upon which the whole structure of this reasoning depended. At present there was great difficulty in various directions in finding fresh employment. It was not contended that the country was ruined already, but it was contended that other countries were progressing more rapidly than this country, and they asked the people of this country to consider whether a doctrine of economy, which was good and right in a different state of conditions when this country had an overwhelming predominance as a manufacturing country, should apply now, when this country was being left behind by several foreign rivals. It was because the change was taking place more and more rapidly that it seemed to him that the time had arrived to reconsider the old doctrine and take thought as to whether free trade, which was a right policy when this country was the strongest in the world, remained a right policy now, when this country was becoming weaker than foreign countries. He hoped that when the time for a General Election came the country would be able to arrive at a right and wise decision.

MR. BELL (Derby), said that Labour Members had not taken very much part in this important debate. During the whole of this week the speeches on both sides of the House had been of a very practical character, and, whether for or against the Amendment, had been entirely in favour of the working-man's interest. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade in his speech the other day, said that Mr. Cobden complained that the labour leaders took no part in the movement for free trade. It seemed singular that at present the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham also complained that the labour leaders took no part in this question. As far as his memory served him from reading the history of the trades unions, there were not in the days of Cobden what they now recognised as trades union leaders, and it would have been rather difficult for Cobden to have had the support of the trades union leaders when there were none. The hon. Member who had just spoken also referred to the trades unions in 1842, and to their wild action as being responsible for many of the difficulties of those days. He understood, however, that the trades unions were not in existence in reality until 1871, and any such unions as might have existed during the time of Cobden and during the years the hon. Member referred to were simply spontaneous combinations of workmen who felt themselves oppressed by employers. What did really suprise him was that the objects that both sections in this question had in view was the interest of the British workman. Those who wanted to tax his food wanted to do it in his interest. Those who wanted to maintain the present position, so far as the fiscal question was concerned, likewise desired it in the workman's interest. He had no doubt that when they came to scrutinise the division list they should find that those gentlemen who went into the Lobby on Monday in order to show their practical sympathy with the working man and the working man's interest, by taxing their food and other commodities, would be the same people as would be found in the Division Lobby on Tuesday in order to support the importation of Chinese labour into South Africa—and this in the interest also of the British workman. He certainly felt unable to reconcile the two positions. Even granting their contention, for the sake of argument, that protection would find them more employment, surely to take Chinese labour into South Africa, thus depriving the British workman of employment, could not also be to his interest. It had been said that the trades unionists of this country were not against the proposals—both the official and the unofficial policy of the Government—now before the country. Here, at any rate, he voiced the unanimous opinion of the few labour men they had in this House; and whilst Members who had spoken might say that they were speaking in the name of the working classes of this country—whilst perhaps they might admit that they were, for they were in this House by the support and co-operation of the working classes—at any rate, the direct voice of the working man had not been heard before now. At the outset the Trades Union Congress, which was the highest authority in this country—at any rate of the organised workmen—had proclaimed practically unanimously against the proposals which were now submitted for their consideration. And in spite of what had been stated from the Treasury Bench by the various Ministers of the Cabinet, they still maintained that the real object in view was the taxation of food whenever the opportunity was convenient, and as far as the organised section of labour was concerned they meant to resist it for all they were worth. He was grateful for the few complimentary references which the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire made to one of his esteemed friends, Mr. Kelly, of Manchester, some of whose remarks he had endeavoured to use as being favourable to his views with regard to a protective tariff, and he would assure the right hon. Gentleman and the House likewise that his good wishes would be appreciated not only by Mr. Kelly himself but by all of them who were interested in this great question. Whilst the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman were endorsed by all of them, he ventured to say Mr. Kelly would be a great acquisition to this House, to them at any rate who directly represented labour, although if he were a Member there would be one vote the less for the views held by the right hon. Gentleman, because the Gentleman who now represented the division which Mr. Kelly was contesting was a very strong supporter of the right hon. Gentleman's views. It would be one more to their side if Mr. Kelly were returned, and therefore he wished him every success in his election campaign.

He thought it would be well at this juncture if he were to state the views of the representatives of labour on this great question, although some tendency had been shown to despise, perhaps, any observations made by those who were placed in the front rank of the movement and were endeavouring to lead the men as far as their own lights would enable them. The representatives of the great labour movement issued a manifesto to the whole of the workers of this country, and the result on being analysed showed that out of thirteen labour members in this House, the twelve who were present—one was absent at the time through illness—signed this manifesto; out of forty-four directors of the Co-operative Wholesale Society, thirty-seven signed the manifesto; and of the members of the Central Board of the Co-operative Union, numbering eighty, seventy-three signed the manifesto. Of the thirteen members of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress one was bedridden for many months, but the other twelve signed the manifesto; the Committee representing the whole of the trades unions by federation numbered altogether sixteen, and fourteen of them signed the manifesto; and of the twenty-three labour representatives who formed the Moseley Commission to America sixteen signed the manifesto. So that here they found a very large majority, in fact, you might almost say the whole, against the proposals. Here, at any rate, they had practically the unanimous voice of the representatives of the trades unions and of the co-operative movement in this country. He thought that they had some reason to understand this question for themselves. Fortunately, they were not now quite so illiterate and ignorant as they might have been during the year 1840, and thereabouts, the time to which the right hon. Member had referred, and they had an opportunity now at all events of considering some of these things. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Northwich Division referred to the trades unions as being one of the things which to some extent injured the industries of this country. He was not one who would stand up here or anywhere else and say that trades unions had not made any mistakes, and that they had not done very unwise things on some occasions; but he claimed that there were employers as bad as any trades union had ever been. It was the bad employers, the oppressive employers, who were really the cause of the inception of trades unionism; and whilst perhaps a trades union in one instance might have shown some stubbornness in refusing to negotiate with the employers, he would guarantee that on the other side they could find five employers who were equally stubborn in refusing to negotiate with the union. He knew what this stubbornness was, and the employers knew what it was, and unless both employers and representatives of trades unions could exercise a little common-sense and come together and discuss these things in a proper and friendly and amicable way, they might expect similar things to occur in the future. He had had some experience in this matter; and he ventured to say that where there were good feelings existing between the representatives of the trades unions and the representatives of the employers they heard little or nothing of strikes or any troubles of the kind.

And, it being Midnight, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed this day.

Adjourned at one minute after Twelve o'clock.

WEI-HAI-WEI.

Earl SPENCER: My Lords, seeing the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, I should like to ask him whether there is any truth in the rumour that has appeared in the newspapers this morning—namely, that we have given Wei-hai-Wei to the Japanese as a base for their naval operations. As this is a matter of some importance, perhaps the noble Marquess can see his way to make a statement upon it to-night.

The SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of Lansdowne): My Lords, my attention was directed to the rumour to which the noble Earl has referred. I need not say that the assertion is entirely without foundation, and that it is, in our belief, a mischievous fabrication. We have, however, thought it desirable to telegraph to our representatives on the spot, with the object of ascertaining whether any incident has taken place to give the slightest colour for the report.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

The Marquess of LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I am sure your Lordships will have learned with regret, from the Motion which I have placed on the Paper, that the noble Earl who presides over our Committees is prevented for a time through illness from discharging those duties which he has for so many years performed greatly to his own credit, and, I believe, entirely to the satisfaction of the House. My noble friend has been advised by his medical attendants to seek rest for a time, and, in those circumstances, it is necessary to make arrangements for the performance of his duties until his return. I beg to move the Motion standing in my name, and I feel sure every member of your Lordships' House will join with me in hoping that the noble Earl will soon be restored to health and able to again take his place at the Table.

Moved, That the Lord Balfour be appointed to take the Chair in the Committee of the Whole House, and in all Committees upon Private Bills in the absence of the Chairman of Committees from illness.—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

Earl SPENCER: My Lords, I am sure everyone in the House will join with the noble Marquess in the regret which he has expressed at the illness of the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, and in the hope that the noble Earl may be very soon restored to health, so that he may again occupy the position which he fills so admirably, and to the entire satisfaction of the House. We shall all be glad to support the proposition of the noble Marquess, that, in the absence of Lord Morley, Lord Balfour of Burleigh should discharge the duties of Chairman of Committees.

The Earl of CORK: My Lords, I hope I may be allowed to join in the feeling expressed by the noble Marquess opposite and by my noble friend the Leader of the Opposition. I regret that for some little time to come Lord Morley will be prevented from occupying the place which he so well fills in this House. Having been for so many years closely connected with railway and other matters, I feel deeply his absence from the House. He has discharged his duties most ably, and I know perfectly well the feeling of affection which is entertained towards him by everybody who has been brought into contact with him. I know also the feeling towards him of the railway officials who have had to deal with him, and I feel certain it is the hearty wish of all that the noble Earl may soon make his reappearance as Chairman of Committees—a position which he has so admirably filled for many years past.

The Duke of ABERCORN: My Lords, I should like to be allowed, as a humble Member on this side of the House, to say that we all deeply regret the absence of the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, and trust that before long he may be restored to perfect health and again be in his place.

On Question, Motion agreed to.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, I am sure the House will allow me to express very humbly my deep sense of the honour which has been conferred upon me, and the confidence which is placed in me, in allowing me to take this place for a time. It has come upon me with great suddenness, for I only knew of the possibility of it twenty-four hours ago. I will do my best to carry on the work for the time being in the same spirit, so far as I can imitate it, as the noble Earl who has filled the position for the last fifteen years, and no one will be more glad than myself when the noble Earl is able to resume the duties.

CHINESE LABOUR IN THE TRANSVAAL.

Order of the Day read for the adjourned debate on the Motion of the Marquess of Ripon, That an humble address be presented to His Majesty's Government for Papers relating to the affairs of the Transvaal and Orange River Colony, with special reference to the question of the employment of Chinese labour in the Transvaal."

EARL GREY: My Lords, as I listened yesterday to the speech of the noble Earl who initiated this discussion and who I regret not to see in his place to-day, and to the speech of the noble Marquess who followed him, I could not help feeling that those speeches supplied a very melancholy and a most forcible illustration of the danger connected with the attempt to rule a country six thousand miles away from this House. I do not think it would be possible to conceive a state of things more remote from the actual truth than the supposition of the noble Lord and the noble Marquess that the effect of the temporary employment of indentured Asiatics would be to oust or exclude British labour from the Transvaal. The exact opposite is the truth. On the contrary, the desire to employ, for a time, indentured Asiatics, which exists throughout the length and breadth of the Transvaal, arises from a profound conviction in the minds of men who have felt the hard pinch and stress of adverse circumstances that (1) if they are to provide employment for the new stream of British immigrants coming into the country, (2) if the Transvaal is to provide employment for the British population now resident in the Colony, and (3) if the threatened exodus of the settlers who have been attracted to the Transvaal is to be averted, it is absolutely necessary to have recourse to the measure which now engages the attention of the House.

The noble Earl who initiated this debate went so far as to declare that in his opinion it was the policy of Lord Milner to exclude British labour from the Transvaal. Does not the noble Lord know, what I thought everyone in this country knew, that it is the hope and ambition of Lord Milner to lay the secure foundation of a future British federation of self-governing States from the Zambesi to the Cape, and that the only hope of his policy being a success depends on attracting so large an influx of British settlers into South Africa as to make it absolutely impossible that South Africa will ever again become the scene of a race conflict between the Briton and the Boer? It is for this reason, and for this reason principally, because the temporary employment of Asiatic indentured labour will enable the Transvaal to provide employment, and highly-paid employment, for thousands of British artisans for whom under present conditions no employment can be found, that Lord Milner and everyone else who has at heart the hopes of seeing a peaceful and prosperous South Africa, attaches so much importance to the passage of the measure which has now been read a third time by the Legislative Council of the Transvaal.

I should have thought when I had stated that, that if that reason could be proved, it was sufficient for my argument; but, if I am not trespassing on the indulgence of your Lordships, may I adduce one or two reasons why I believe that the temporary employment of indentured Asiatics cannot result in the exclusion of British labour from the Transvaal as the noble Marquess seems to think it will? It has been my privilege to pay repeated visits to South Africa, and, although it may be difficult for any Englishman who has not visited that country to realise the fact, it is nevertheless a fact, which confronts one at every turn after one once enters South Africa, that the white man will not do work which he considers is specially the province of the Kaffir; I have seen their eyes contract and scintillate with hate and indignation when British artisans have been asked to do work which they consider would be degrading and would reduce them to the level of a Kaffir. Unless this House recognises this primary and essential fact I am afraid it is hardly in a position to solve the problem which stands before it to-day. Apart from that fact, you have the economic fact that it is impossible to work the mines with white labour except, under present conditions, at a rate of wage which no white man should be asked to accept. When the cost of living is reduced the position may be altered, but we have got to reduce the cost of living first. There are only two ways in which you can effect a reduction in the cost of living in South Africa—one is by growing the food required in South Africa in the country, instead of importing it from across the seas. Well, if we are to grow in South Africa the food required in the Transvaal, you must not tempt with very high wages all the available unskilled Kaffir labour for work in the mines. The employment of indentured Asiatics, under careful regulations, in the mines will set free a supply of Kaffir labour for work upon the land, and so make the first essential factor of cheap living possible, for it will enable the agricultural industry of South Africa to be developed with greater success than at present. The other factor in lessening the cost of living is the reduction of taxation and of railway rates. How are you to reduce railway rates unless you can command a large volume of traffic? Every gentleman connected with the administration of railways knows that the rate on railways is dependent on the volume of traffic that passes over the line. The volume of traffic is dependent on a prosperous mining industry, which is the successful pivot of all industry in South Africa; and a prosperous mining industry, again, depends upon being able to demand an adequate supply of unskilled labour. I therefore come back to the necessity of the temporary importation of indentured Asiatics in order that the mining industries should be prosperous, the volume of traffic large, the rates low, taxes reduced, and, consequently, the cost of living brought within limits which may render it possible to make experiments with white labour.

Earl Grey.

I do not wish to bore your Lordships with any reference to technical points, but I am aware that there is a gentleman—Mr. Creswell by name—who is an enthusiast on the subject of white labour—as, indeed, we all are—and he has made, perfectly honestly and with great ability, experiments which he hopes will prove that it is possible to replace unskilled coloured labour with unskilled white labour. I think, however well-meaning and enthusiastic he may be—and I, for one, sympathise with the attempt he has made to solve this problem—the whole weight of testimony is against it. All the mining engineers and the managers of the mines on the Rand, with his exception, believe that the substitution of unskilled white labour for native workers has proved costly and unsatisfactory; the work performed having varied from the maximum of the work of one white man being equal to that of two natives—which is a large assumption—to the minimum of one white being only equal to a native, whilst the pay was in the ratio of ten shillings for a white man as against two shillings for a black. The increased cost of working the mines by unskilled white labour is so excessive as to make it economically an impossible proposition. On the favourable assumption that a white man at twelve shillings a day would do quite as much work as a Kaffir at 2s.4d. per day, the average cost per ton is increased 10s. 1d., which would have a disastrous effect on the mines in the Witwatersrand area.

It was my business two or three years ago to examine very closely the relation between the numbers of coloured unskilled labourers and the numbers of the white population, and I found, to my surprise—and I think it was a matter of general surprise—that, whether you looked to Johannesburg, to Rhodesia, or to Kimberley you found the same curious coincidence that the number of unskilled coloured labourers corresponded very closely with the white population. Subsequent experience has, I believe, confirmed that first discovery, and I see it anticipated by those who have given a very close attention to this question that for every thousand Chinamen you import for a term into the Transvaal, you will have an addition of 800 to your white population, counting men, women, and children. Let me endeavour to prove to your Lordships, by a concrete instance, how necessary it is that we should increase the supply of coloured unskilled labour. I am acquainted with a group of mines in Rhodesia. Owing to the fact that the manager was able at the time of the war, owing to the mines in Johannesburg not being in operation, to obtain a sufficient supply of unskilled labour he was in a position to offer very highly-paid employment to over 100 white men on business directly connected with the mines, and this group of four mines provided sufficient trade for a whole host of hangers-on, for shops, livery stables, and hotels, and was also the means of building a line of 100 miles, which, of course, gave employment to a large number of white men connected with railways and helped to develop the country. These very mines since the war, owing to the competition that exists for drill boys, who are essential for the economical working of the mines, are unable to obtain the labour they require. The overwhelming proportion of the labour required to work the Rhodesian mines is imported from countries outside the borders, and here they enter into competition with the Rand and therefore have felt most acutely the pinch which comes from the inability of Johannesburg to supply its own mines with the labour required.

Let me further point out this consideration to your Lordships. In the yearly Report of the Government Mining Engineer for the year ended June last, the statement is made that, of the salaries and wages paid for employment in the mines, about £600,000 was paid in salaries, £2,700,000 in wages to white men, and £950,000, roughly, in wages to natives; that is to say, 28 per cent. of the total was paid to black unskilled labourers and 72 per cent. to white skilled artisans. Now, my Lords, just follow out these figures. Suppose 100,000 Chinamen were imported into the Rand and were to receive a wage of 45s. per month, which I believe is about the wage contemplated; they would receive about £2,500,000 a year, and, if the same proportion were to exist between the amount of wages paid to white and yellow labour as to-day exists between that paid to white and black labour, then the amount of money available for the salaries and wages of highly-paid white men would amount to between £7,000,000 and £8,000,000 sterling. Now if you were to divide the latter sum by the average yearly wage paid to the white employés on the Rand before the war, which was £353 per head, you get this result, that you have 20,000 white men to whom employment at that average rate of wage would be found, or one white man for every five coloured unskilled labourers, whether black or yellow. I take one other calculation to press my point home. The number of stamps at work on the Rand last November was 4,310, as against 7,145 before the war. That means that there are about 3,000 stamps idle which ought to be at work, and which, if they could be got to work again, would give employment to between 5,000 and 6,000 additional skilled white workmen at the mines, besides attracting tradesmen and others who make a living out of the mines.

I hope I have said enough to show your Lordships that the employment of Chinese indentured labour, so far from excluding British labour from South Africa, is really the foundation upon which the increased employment of British labour rests. Let me turn to another point What does this industry mean for British industries at home? A most interesting Blue-book has been issued by the Board of Trade containing a Report by Mr. Henry Birchenough, who was sent on a special commercial mission to South Africa, and I quote the following from his Report—

> "The rapidity with which South Africa has come to the front as a great market for British manufactures is almost startling. Ten years ago—in 1893—Great Britain's exports to South Africa were valued at a little under £9,000,000. Last year they almost reached £26,000,000. In 1893 South Africa stood sixth on the list of Britain's customers; last year she stood second. She has left America, Germany, France, and Australia behind, and was only beaten by India. It is no rash prediction that next year she will pass India and stand first on the list as the largest buyer in the world of the produce and manufactures of the mother country."

The realisation of that prophecy entirely depends, my Lords, upon His Majesty's Government being authorised by Parliament to give their consent to the adoption and the working of the Ordinance which has now unanimously passed its Third Reading in the Legislative Council of the Transvaal. To put it in a nutshell, Mr. Birchenough maintains that—

> "Leaving the realm of conjecture and prediction, it may be asserted that for every additional new stamp that is erected £1,600 worth of imported machinery will be required."

He calculates on the statement of the Government Mining Engineer that, given an adequate supply of coloured unskilled labour, there will be a further addition of 8,000 stamps at work five years hence; thus in the year 1908 there will be 14,500 stamps at work in the Witwatersrand area, and every one of those 8,000 new stamps means the purchase of British material to the extent of about £1,600. That sum, multiplied by 8,000, gives you the not very small total of £12,800,000 as the trade which will come to this country provided we can obtain sufficient unskilled labour to enable these 8,000 additional stamps to be worked. Every stamp in South Africa which is at work buys in British material alone, in order to enable it to perform its functions, an average of £330 worth per stamp per annum. That means that there will be on these 14,500 stamps, in addition to the £12,800,000 initial purchase of British goods, an annual expenditure of £4,785,000; and taking into account the stores required by the mines in the Transvaal—I am not taking into consideration the mines in Rhodesia which are equally affected, but am looking to the Transvaal alone—it will represent an expenditure of not less than £5,500,000 a year. Well, my Lords, I hope I have shown that South Africa, given a sufficient supply of unskilled labour, is the best customer that England has for the manufactures it produces. It already takes 23 per cent. of the total exports to British possessions, and if you allow the Transvaal to manage its own affairs that percentage will be largely increased. The noble Marquess on the Front Opposition Bench said yesterday that it was almost indecent to hurry legislation in this matter. He wished to hang it up until self-government had been restored to the Transvaal. Well, my Lords, in view of Lord Milner's assurance that further delay in present conditions means the shutting down of mines which it does not pay to work; that it means an exodus of the present population of the Transvaal, and possibly, a recrudescence and revival of racial and political difficulties, I contend that the further postponement of this question does not admit even of consideration. The crisis is urgent and must be dealt with at once. I was rather surprised to hear the noble Earl Lord Portsmouth and the noble Marquess on the Front Opposition Bench refer to the suggestion that a referendum should be taken with expressions almost of contempt. I could hardly believe my ears when the noble Earl informed the noble Duke the Under-Secretary for the Colonies that he would not be content with a referendum because in his opinion it would not give an honest return of the actual opinion of the population. I have had the great privilege of seeing Lord Milner at work in the Transvaal. I know what trouble he has taken to surround himself with officials of the highest character and the greatest ability, and I believe that of the many great services which Lord Milner has contributed to the Empire, the service he has rendered in establishing a Civil Service of the highest possible character in the Transvaal which will carry on his ideal when self-government is restored to it, is not the least of those services. I therefore think it is a disgrace on the part of any Member of this House to refer to Lord Milner and the whole of the Civil Service as if they were scoundrels and rogues.

The noble Marquess said he wanted a constitutional expression of the opinion of the Transvaal. If the noble Marquess had made himself acquainted with the facts connected with the election of the Municipal Council of Johannesburg, which is elected under the ballot and upon a wide franchise, he would have realised that, out of nineteen members who were nominated by Lord Milner to serve on the Legislative Council, eighteen were returned for their separate constituencies, and that only one of Lord Milner's nominees was not returned, and he was Mr. Whiteside, one of the two gentlemen who signed the Minority Report. That is sufficient to show that the Transvaal, where they have had an opportunity of expressing their view by constitutional method, have declared that they desire to have indentured Chinese labour. There is not the slightest doubt that it is the desire of the Transvaal, and this Parliament will be taking upon itself a most serious responsibility if it prevents the wish of the Transvaal being carried into effect.

The noble Marquess was very much impressed by the fact that in Cape Colony both Parties are opposed to the importation of indentured Chinamen into the Transvaal. I do not know whether it is in the recollection of your Lordships that a few years ago a very influential organisation was founded, of which Lord Avebury and Mr. Leonard Courtney were the chief spirits, the object of which was to reform our present system of conducting elections, with a view of securing that the House of Commons should be a faithful mirror of the nation at large. One of the objections to our present system was that where Parties are equally balanced the independent man is given a supreme position on the political seesaw. It is absolutely necessary if you go into politics as practical men that you should do everything in your power, while elections are carried out under present conditions, to capture the balancing vote which decides the character of the election. That is exactly what is happening in Cape Colony. You have six or seven constituencies in which the Bond and the Progressives are equally balanced, and there is a comparatively small Kaffir vote which can decide the election, and can also decide whether the Bond Party or the Progressive Party should get a majority at a general election. Do you suppose, my Lords, clever electioneers like Mr. Merriman, who is now, I understand, experiencing a little political repose, and like the Bond Party—the cleverest electioneers in the British Empire—are not going to take advantage of any cry they can get hold of in order to attract the Kaffir vote to their side? Every Kaffir has had a hideous picture painted for him by the Bond Party showing how the introduction of Chinamen is going to fill his life with misery, horror, and anxiety. The Progressive Party, on the other hand, have been compelled to complain that they, too, are also strongly opposed to the introduction of Chinese labour; and Dr. Jameson gave notice that he would introduce a Bill making it illegal for Chinamen to come from the Transvaal into Cape Colony.

Then the noble Earl made a great point of the fact that while thirty per thousand was the rate of mortality in the De Beers mines at Kimberley, seventy per thousand was the rate of mortality in Johannesburg. He drew the inference that, therefore, the treatment of the natives was bad, and that if the treatment had been good the mines would have been able to obtain all the labour they required. The noble Earl has not had the advantage which I have had of studying the conditions both on the Rand and at Kimberley. Let me explain the difference between the conditions of work at Kimberley and at Johannesburg. At Kimberley, owing to the fact that you have to deal with an article which can be stolen simply by being swallowed, it has been found necessary to employ the compound system. In the Rand there is no such system. The natives are allowed to go where they please. The result is that the Kaffirs in the DeBeers mines at Kimberley are better cared for, and run less risk of laying the seeds of disease than the natives on the Rand. And there is this further difference, that the diamond mines at Kimberley are worked by men who are drawn from the high plateau lands of South Africa—mainly from Basutoland, which is the Switzerland of South Africa. They are a much more hardy race than the coast natives who work at Johannesburg. I think I have explained the reasons which account for the increased mortality at Johannesburg as compared with Kimberley.

The most rev. Primate, who, with a statesmanship which characterises all his utterances, did not oppose himself to the measure which is before the House, very properly drew the attention of His Majesty's Government to certain grave dangers which he saw in the importation of indentured Chinamen into Johannesburg. I feel that His Majesty's Government will, in consultation with Lord Milner, provide every safeguard that can be provided, but I should hope that this House would see the wisdom of allowing the Transvaal to settle this affair in the way that may seem to them best. I would point this consideration to the most rev. Primate. It is only suggested that the Chinamen should come for an indentured term of a few years. That is exactly what the Kaffirs are doing in Kimberley to-day, and, if the principle of the compound is vicious for indentured Chinamen, the principle is equally vicious at the De Beers mines, where every one admits who has made a study of the matter, that the condition of the natives in the compounds is better than that of any other natives outside Kimberley. Even in the British Army privates enlist for three years, and are not afforded the advantages of family life any more than is proposed in the case of the indentured Chinamen. Further than that, every pioneer has to do without the advantages of family life; it is one of the penalties he has to pay for his enterprise in opening up a new country. I have not got the figures by me, but in the Transvaal, before the war, the percentage of married miners who were there without their wives was a very large one indeed. What we have to do is to reduce the cost of living, in order that our white community may be able to live under conditions which lead to that morality which characterises all British communities.

On the question of fair treatment of the miners I would only say this, that it is absolutely to the interest of the mine manager to treat his natives well, for otherwise he cannot obtain the labour supply on which he depends for the prosecution of his industry. Major Pearce, in a Report on the Trade and General Conditions of the British Central African Protectorate for 1902–3, refers to the good effect which work in the mines of Rhodesia has had on the natives who come from Central Africa. He quotes the opinion recorded by one of the most philanthropic missionaries in South Africa, who has had an extremely long residence in the country, and has unparalleled knowledge of the British Central African native. He states that they are brought into contact with European wonders, and that the superintendence of the white men has rendered the natives much cleaner in their habits, more dignified and more hard-working, and that instead of the dull intellect, with no other thought than women, food, and beer, the younger generation who have sought improvement beyond the limits of their own country now show a far better stamp of countenance and have a greater desire to learn and write. That shows that the mines in Rhodesia are the best schools to which the natives of South Africa can go; and the presence of indentured Asiatics in the Rand mines is absolutely necessary unless the prosperity of Rhodesia is to receive a fatal check.

It is said that this is a form of slavery, but there is no compulsion to make the Chinaman come. He comes of his own accord. The question is asked, "Will he come"? I read in a Report by Mr. Campbell, His Majesty's Consul, on a journey in Mongolia that many of the Chinese have to live and support their families on a penny a day. I do not think it requires very great compulsion to induce Chinamen who are receiving that rate of wage, on which they often have to support a wife and nine children, to come to the Transvaal, where they can obtain a monthly wage of 45s. and at the end of their term of indenture, can return to China capitalists, enabled to live with their families in far greater prosperity than is within the reach of those who remain at home. The noble Marquess on the Front Opposition Bench ventured yesterday to lecture the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for supporting the introduction of indentured Asiatic Labour into the Transvaal at such a critical time as the present in the Far East.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I beg the noble Earl's pardon. I did not take the noble Marquess to task over the matter. I simply said that it was a most unfortunate time to have negotiations of this sort with China. I never dreamt of blaming the noble Marquess for the course he has taken. As a matter of fact, I do not know what he has done.

EARL GREY: I think it is still more unfortunate, when the whole peace and prosperity of South Africa depends on our being able to obtain, in response to the wish of the Transvaal, the importation, under carefully considered regulations, of indentured Asiatic Labour, that the noble Marquess should use his influence in this House on the side of inducing the authorities in China to check the flow of Chinamen out of that country into the Transvaal. In my opinion the real danger in South Africa is not the yellow peril but the black peril. You have a small white population living in a country in which the blacks are steadily growing. As they increase in numbers you will have to find means of enabling them to support themselves by honest labour. They are growing gradually to assume European wants, but the pace is very slow, and it is because I take a really serious view of the future of South Africa, that I feel it is necessary, as an education to our black population, that the indentured Asiatic should come in and do the same work which, up to now, has been performed by them, so as to enable the country to lay the foundation of a big and growing industry which will every year demand more and more labour, and to render it possible, when the time comes that the increased black population are unable to maintain themselves out of their farms, for them to earn their livelihood by work at the mines, by replacing the indentured Asiatics whom we only ask for as a temporary stop-gap.

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, I beg at the outset in the clearest possible way to dissociate myself from any unknown or anonymous person who has ever called Lord Milner or any person connected with the Rand a rogue or a scoundrel. I feel very deeply on this subject, and I think it is the duty in this crisis of every man to speak openly and fearlessly, and I assure your Lordships that whatever I have to say on this subject will be said with the greatest respect to every person connected with the mining industry, and, above all, to the great nation of China, whose natives it is proposed to bring into the Transvaal. We have nothing to say against China or against her people; but we oppose the bringing of these people into a British colony, and also the way in which this labour is proposed to be brought in. The noble Earl who has just sat down seemed to me to have two main propositions in his interesting and forcible speech. He said first that the whole peace and prosperity of the Transvaal depends on the temporary employment of Chinese, and he made a great point of the word "temporary." But I would very respectfully say to the noble Earl that all those who have knowledge of Chinese in a British colony know that while it is very easy to get them into it it, is as difficult to get them out as it is to get the white ants out of a Queensland log hut.

I should like for one moment to refer to what the noble Earl said about Mr. Cresswell, who is well known now as a sort of missionary of white labour in this country. Mr. Cresswell maintains that white labour can be made to pay. That is the whole foundation of our argument. We say that it has not been proved that white labour is impossible. The noble Earl truly said that a great argument had been brought against Mr. Cresswell's proposals, and no doubt Mr. Cresswell had to leave his employment, but my noble friend Lord Portsmouth yesterday pointed out to the House what the reason of the cessation of white labour was. It was put in evidence before the Labour Commission. A letter from the representative in England was sent out to say that Messrs. Wernher Beit and Co., for various reasons, opposed white labour. That letter is in evidence, and I need not take up the time of the House in further referring to it. The noble Earl went on to draw a most magnificent fancy picture of 14,500 stamps in full work, and he almost took one's breath away with the millions that were to be turned out and the thousands of pounds that this country was going to receive in consequence of the enormous increase of trade on account of Chinese labour. But I would very respectfully submit that if, as we believe, white labour can be employed at a profit, instead of supplementing the present labour with yellow labour we should supplement it with white labour. You would then have this result, that you would save the passage money to and from the Flowery Land of these indentured labourers, and the whole of the £2,700,000 would go into the pockets of white men, who we still maintain could run these mines and work them at a profit.

EARL GREY: My point is that if this proposal is not adopted you will not have 4,000 stamps at work.

EARL CARRINGTON: I would point out to the noble Earl that the majority of the mining agents in South Africa are not Britons at all; they are Americans, and therefore they are perfectly content with the status quo. Why should they puzzle their brains to get new machinery and new means of making a mine pay when they have the wish expressed by the magnates in London that they should continue as they are with cheap labour imported from China? May I be permitted for one moment to turn to a speech which we listened to with great interest last night —I allude to the speech of the noble Duke the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, and to compliment the noble Duke upon it. It was certainly the opinion of everyone on this side of the House that he made a most excellent defence of what, unhappily, we consider to be an uncommonly bad case. The noble Duke told us that mining is the staple industry on which the prosperity of the country depends. With that the noble Earl who has just sat down entirely agrees, and I suppose there is not one person in your Lordships' House or in this country who would disagree with that, and that to my mind seems to be all the more reason why the mines should be worked with resident white labour and not with Asiatic indentured labour. The question, in our judgment, should be determined by an Imperial Commission, with Imperial assessors, and not decided on the evidence of mine-owners alone and of their engineers, most of whom, as I have said, are not British but American.

It seems to us that the mining industry is divided into two absolutely different sections. There is, first, the company-promoting, share-producing industry, and I suppose I shall have again to say that I speak with every possible respect of that industry; on the other hand, there is the mining industry proper. I maintain that these mining magnates, as they are called—these financial magnates —cannot in any way be compared with the leaders of British industry, such as ironmasters, coalowners or shipowners, who, to run their business, must be well aware of the intricacies of them. It seems to me that the Government on the one side is accepting the representations of the first section, while we who are opposing this accept the representations of the second or industrial section. I am not in the habit of speaking for other people, but I am informed by Mr. Richard Bell, who represents 2,000,000 working-men, by Mr. John Burns, Mr. William Crooks, Mr. W. Steadman, and the other leaders in the industrial world, that my noble friend the Marquess of Ripon when he brought this question before your Lordships and objected to the Ordinance, had every British workman at his back. That is important enough, but I also think I am not exaggerating when I say that my noble friend in his battle for white labour has also the support of every single Colonial Governor, with, perhaps, one or two exceptions. He has also, naturally, the support of the Colonies themselves. An allusion was, I think, made in the debate to Canada, and to the fact that Canada had said nothing. Canada has not spoken Imperially, but it has acted Imperially, for I believe that within the last few weeks the Colony of British Columbia has put up the poll tax—my noble friend the Earl of Aberdeen will correct me if I am wrong—has put up the poll tax on every Chinaman to £100 a head.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: One hundred dollars.

EARL CARRINGTON: Then the noble Duke went on to say that the opinion in South Africa in general is not unfavourable to the proposal. Take Rhodesia. You have there simply a handful of men who are entirely under the direction and under the orders of certain speculative companies. They have no self-government—

EARL GREY: I beg the noble Earl's pardon. We have in Rhodesia a Legislative Council which is elected by the people, and our Legislative Council unanimously passed in 1901 an Ordinance authorising the importation of indentured Asiatics into the country under very careful conditions. It has not been permitted up to now to use that Ordinance, but I trust that Rhodesia will have the same right accorded to it as the Transvaal.

EARL CARRINGTON: After what the noble Earl has said I withdraw my statement and accept the correction. Let us now take Natal. Natal is a semi-tropical colony full of aliens and supports the proposal, because they cannot logically refuse approval, as it is identically what they are doing themselves. I need not trouble the House with the opinion of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony, because that was duly dealt with by my noble friend behind me. With regard to Cape Colony, I think the noble Duke the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies will agree with me that every single person in Cape Colony is dead against the proposal.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Duke of MARLBOROUGH): No.

EARL CARRINGTON: I do not desire to exaggerate in any way, I will therefore say that in Cape Colony the consensus of opinion is decidedly opposed to the proposal.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: Hear, hear!

EARL CARRINGTON: I saw a little of the Chinese in Australia. In 1888 I was given to understand by Sir Henry Parkes that there might probably be a great difficulty as to the introduction of Chinese into the colony, and that if any large number of Chinese were proposed to be landed, they would probably be resisted by force. The crisis came quicker than most people expected. Early in May, 1888, three ships, with something like 500 Chinese coolies on board each ship, tried to land in Sydney harbour. The whole population turned out with swords and staves. They stood on the quay and said: "These people shall not land." The excitement was so great that there was a meeting of 40,000 people, and anti-Chinese resolutions were passed. The mayor, at the head of 5,000 citizens, marched up George Street to Parliament Street and tried to get into the Legislative Assembly, the House being then sitting, to inform the Government what the feeling about the Chinese was. They were shut out, but the language that was used by the Prime Minister will, perhaps, show what the tension of feeling was at that time. The Prime Minister said in Parliament—

> In this crisis of the Chinese question we do not mean to turn back. Neither for Her Majesty's ships of war, nor for Her Majesty's representative on the spot, nor for the Secretary of State, do we intend to turn back from our purpose, which is to terminate the landing of the Chinese in Australia for ever."

I do not think the Australians approved of that strong language, but I am bound to say that it reflected the opinion of every individual in the colony. The men on the ships to which I have referred were not allowed to be landed. I then telegraphed over to the Secretary of State for the Colonies—at that time Viscount Knutsford—informing him of the state of affairs, and asked whether, if a Chinese Restriction Bill was passed which could be approved, I might give the Royal Assent to it. The noble Viscount rose to the occasion, and though it was then stated by several important personages, as it is in this case, that this was a dishonest cry, yet he gave me permission, and I was able to tell the Ministers that there would be no difficulty as to the Royal Assent being given to a Chinese Immigration Restriction Bill. That action, if it did not prevent the separation of the colony altogether, at any rate put an end to a very dangerous crisis.

Then I think it might be asked, and very forcibly asked, what is the objection to these Chinamen? There must be something behind it. Englishmen know as little about the Chinese question as most Australians do about Spanish marriages. What is the object of this great antagonism to Chinamen? We know them to be a very frugal, patient, industrious, and law-abiding race; but there are objections to them that they undersell the white population. In Australia we know they are extremely difficult to get rid of. In the case of South Africa there is that black peril to which the noble Earl alluded, which is, of course, a great menace, but if there was a rising amongst the natives it would be an uncommonly disagreeable thing for a small band of white settlers to have 150,000 or 200,000 discontented Chinamen in their rear. But I think I ought to state what was always considered in Australia to be the real danger of the Chinese. Their being law-biding people is one of their great dangers. You never hear of a Chinaman being brought up before an English magistrate for any outrage or crime committed on another Chinaman; it is the rarest thing in the world. They are brought up for offences against white people, but not for offences among themselves. They have a sort of law of their own. If a man commits a murder he disappears; if he commits burglary or any other offence he is punished according to the Chinese law, and it is felt that this Imperium in imperio in the State is a very dangerous thing.

The Chinese come as bachelors, and as they are a patient and affectionate race the result is that they marry women of a very low class. We have to look to the future, and the great ideal of the Australian colonists is a white Empire of Anglo-Saxon blood. They do not want any mixture of breed or hybrid marriages. I ask your Lordships to consider what sort of colonists will they be breeding up for the future as subjects of the King in South Africa, whose father was a John Chinaman and whose mother was a woman of the description I have referred to? And, last of all, there is that great evil, to which I need not allude, which was put before the House last night by the most rev. Primate. I think that the whole of Christendom must thank him for having made the speech which he delivered last night. I need not say one more word on that most difficult aspect of the subject. I understand the noble Earl to say that Lord Milner hopes to lay the foundation of a future British federation of self-governing States from the Zambesi to the Cape, and that that is his ambition. I think that is the hope and ambition and ideal of every man in this country. We do not quarrel with the ideal, but with the way in which Lord Milner seems determined to carry it out. I speak of Lord Milner with every possible respect, and even those in South Africa who are opposed to his policy speak of him in the highest possible way. He is universally acknowledged to be a great man, a strong man, to have a very high sense of duty, and to stick to his opinion at all hazards—a very courageous high-principled Englishman. But I would like to ask, is Lord Milner always right? Is he right in this instance? Was he right in 1899 when he took the advice of the leaders of the financial houses and gave us to understand that the Boers would not fight under any circumstances? Was he right in 1902 when he advocated the suspension of the Constitution of the Cape Colony, which was negatived, and everybody thinks very properly negatived, by His Majesty's Government? And was he right in 1903 when he said "We do not want a white proletariat"? The moment that Lord Milner said that the flag was down and the race for Chinese labour began. The noble Duke the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies said, and I have no doubt he and the other members of the Government implicitly believe it, that white labour is discontinued on account of the cost and not from any fear of any white labour combination.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: Hear, hear!

EARL CARRINGTON: Well, but I hardly think that statement can be reconciled which the announcement made by the Committee of Johannesburg Engineers, who as I have already said, are all Americans. What did they say? They said that if this policy—the policy of Chinese labour—is pursued there will be no opening for the trail of the serpent—that is, for the foundation of labour unions; and a still more astounding statement was made at a meeting held on 9th February last year and presided over by Lord Harris. At that meeting a memorandum by Mr. Rudd was quoted, in which that gentleman is reported in The Times to have written—

> "Should we replace 200,000 natives by 100,000 unskilled whites, they would simply hold the Government in the hollow of their hands."

Now, my Lords, those statements seem to me to give the whole case completely away The real reason for this Chinese invasion is that the whites would simply hold the Government in the hollow of their hands. We may think as highly as we like of the integrity, honour, and patriotism of Mr. Rudd, but what are we to think of his understanding? The noble Duke the Under-Secretary told us that in days gone by foreign labourers were imported and the regulations made afterwards, but that now the rules are to be settled before the Chinese are brought in, and their social, moral, and religious interests are to be considered by His Majesty's Government. Let us consider for one moment what the position is. On one of the big mines that I know there are 4,000 coolies to be employed. These men are to be brought over from China, and are to be put into a compound or stockade. I do not know if many noble Lords in this House have seen a native compound. I have, and a more horrible sight it is impossible to conceive. Imagine a piece of ground surrounded with corrugated iron, and crowded with natives, some sitting smoking in a corner, others sitting and gambling, others asleep in different parts of the compound, and a great many of them sitting in a large ring watching a dance, to say the least of it, somewhat wanting in delicacy. You are to bring these Chinamen over, and put them into one of these stockades. You tell them that their working hours are to be spent underground, and that their hours of recreation will be spent in the stockade. They are to have no civic rights; they are not to be allowed to go out of the stockade, except on very special occasions when they may be granted a permit; if they feel aggrieved or ill-used they are, under no circumstances, to be allowed to go out of the compound; if they escape, they are captured and brought back by force; if any white man harbours or succours them, it is an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment; they are not to indulge in any commerce or any trade; they are not to own land or till land. During the three years that they are indentured in this way they are bound over to the person who claims their services. They cannot leave that man's employ, though he has, as I believe was said in the other House of Parliament, power, without their consent, to transfer their services to some other proprietor. That is the social condition that you offer these men. Then, as regards their morality, you say, "Oh! we will look after their morals. We think it is necessary that the wives should accompany them, only we cannot have every one's wife." I believe the proportion of wives is one in every fifty, so that it comes to this—

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: From what document is the noble Earl quoting?

EARL CARRINGTON: I am told that the proportion is as I have stated.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: In Natal the number of wives who accompany the natives is about 40 per cent.

EARL CARRINGTON: Are we to understand that that will be the proportion in the case of the Chinese?

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH: I can make no pledge with regard to the Chinese.

EARL CARRINGTON: There is no pledge forthcoming as to the proportion of wives who are to accompany the Chinese. Then we look after the religious aspect. We tell these people that we respect their religion, and I am given to understand that there is a trade already going to be initiated for supplying the imported Chinese coolies with cheap idols, to be made in this country, for the purpose of their worship. And then, in conclusion, we tell them that we know it is their wish their last resting place should be in China, and we promise to send their bones back in the event of anything happening to them during the three years. I am bound to admit that if the rate of mortality is anything like the seventy per thousand per annum quoted last night by my noble friend Lord Portsmouth, there will be a lucrative trade in carrying back the remains of these unfortunate people to the land from which they came. I apologise to your Lordships for having addressed you at such length, but I felt bound to speak on the subject, as it is one upon which I feel very keenly. I join with my noble friend who introduced this subject to your Lordships and implore the Government to stay their hand. Do let the English nation know what they are doing. At least let us read the evidence that is contained in the Blue-book. There can be no hurry. What is the object of this feverish impatience to get these Chinese people into South Africa? In the good old times, or the bad old times, of Kruger, the output of the gold mines was £100,000,000 sterling a year, while now it has fallen to £70,000,000.

I implore His Majesty's Government to give breathing time, and to let the English nation know what they are doing. If the nation understood what would be the terrible results of this Chinese immigration into South Africa, there would be such a consensus of opinion as would force the Government to flash the message across the seas: "We, the Imperial Government, refuse to sanction this most un-British and unholy thing."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (The Earl of ONSLOW): My Lords, nobody is more entitled to address your Lordships on the subject of the importation of Chinese labour than the noble Earl who has just sat down, for he was Governor of New South Wales at a time when the importation of Chinese labour was a burning question, and I think I may safely say that none of Her Late Majesty's representatives in Australasia was more popular with the people than my noble friend. In his position as the representative of the Crown, the noble Earl naturally had to observe a somewhat guarded attitude on the question until such time as he was able to publish the correspondence which had taken place between himself and the Secretary of State. It was then found that the noble Earl was more Australian than the Australians on this question. He was received everywhere with cheers—with cheers that I have never heard equalled except when a gentleman is belabouring a Government of which he until recently was a member. But the noble Earl has another claim upon your Lordships' attention, because I notice that two or three days ago he was the Chairman of a meeting held at the Queen's Hall to protest against the importation of Asiatic labourers into the Transvaal. That meeting was described in the organ of noble Lords opposite, the Daily News, as one representative of all Parties and of all sections. I looked through the list of Members of the Legislature who were present, and, so far as I could see, the only Member there of the Party to which I have the honour to belong was an hon. and gallant Gentleman a member of the other House of Parliament, who is principally known for the candid criticism which he bestows upon the Government he is supposed to support. Whether it was representative of the sections of the Party to which noble Lords opposite belong I am unable to say, because I do not know how many sections there are.

Earl Carrington.

The noble Earl described the terrors which might menace the small white population in the Transvaal if they had 100,000 Chinamen in their rear. The noble Earl likes to make our flesh creep. I do not think there is this serious menace of the white population in the Transvaal. I agree with the noble Lord that the Chinaman is not a desirable inhabitant of a white country. He is a useful man upon occasions; he has been very useful to my noble friend and myself; he has washed our dirty linen in private, and has grown our cabbages, and he is willing to work for a lower wage than the white man. He is not unlike the Russian and the Pole who settle in the East End of London, and as such the Australian Government were doing what was only their duty to those whom they represented in urging upon the Secretary of State that the Chinaman should be excluded from the colony. But surely, my Lords, the position is quite different in this case. In Australia the Chinese had come in freely, and the difficulty was to get rid of them. The stable door had been left open, and the undesirable animal was allowed to come in and roam about where he pleased. In the case of the Transvaal it is proposed to put him in a comfortable loose-box where he can do no harm, and when his work is done he will go back to his own country with a nice little sum in his pocket. The noble Earl said he would be more difficult to get out than the white ant. I cannot help thinking that there is a little discrepancy in the argument of the noble Earl when he complains of the restrictions on the one hand which are to be placed on the Chinese, and on the other that they will run all over the place and will not be able to be restrained. I believe the precautions which Lord Milner is about to take will be amply sufficient to avoid all the evils which the noble Earl fears. I do not know where the noble Earl got the statement that Lord Milner's prophecies always come untrue; I do not know where he got the quotation that Lord Milner said the Boers would at no time fight the British. In the course of the negotiations, just as in the course of the recent negotiations between Russia and Japan, there may have been moments when it was impossible to conceive that such a thing as war would take place; but because Lord Milner said that at some time or other, I cannot admit that he is a prophet without honour. Then the noble Marquess opposite said last night that there was no precedent in the whole of the King's dominions for such a course as that proposed in this case.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I made the statement on the authority of the Colonial Secretary.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW: Of course, I do not suggest that anything exactly the same has taken place, but for many years past it has been the practice to import indentured coloured labourers into the West Indian Colonies. There is a great similarity between the conditions.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: No.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW: I will point out what the similarity is. In the first place, the Indian coolie is just as much obliged to reside on the plantation as it is proposed that the Chinaman should be obliged to reside in the compound. He cannot leave his plantation without a pass, and he may be fined for deserting from his labour. All these things are identical with the proposals which it is suggested should be made in the Transvaal, and, so far as I know, they have not been looked upon as a condition of slavery by the coolies who are subject to them. Last year I believe there were 14,600 coolies in British Guiana. There were only six complaints made by them, and four were dismissed. Some 1,150 went back to their homes and took with them £9,000, whilst they had remitted £2,000 to their relatives. To show that they did not consider that they were badly treated, although every discouragement was placed in the way of their coming back, 359 returned. The noble Marquess said that it was proposed to bring 196,000 Chinese into the Transvaal. The noble Earl was in error. On the contrary, it has always been the policy of Lord Milner that no stone should be left unturned to get a sufficient number of Kaffir labourers to balance the Chinese who may be imported. What is proposed is to bring in an experimental batch of 10,000, and I can only express the hope that Lord Milner will be successful in getting as many.

I now come to the speech of the most rev. Primate. The Archbishop of Canterbury complained that there was no reference in the Blue-book to any provision for looking after the morals of the Chinese who might be imported into the Transvaal. There was a reference, but I admit that it was not from an official source. Mr. Skinner, who was sent to China by the Transvaal Government to inquire into the conditions of life of the Chinese, recommended that there should be a regular remittance of their wages home, that they should have their passage free with food, and that an advance of wages should be made to them before they left; also that when they arrived they should have free house accommodation, medical attendance, Chinese clothing, and religious facilities. I do not know whether that is the trade in idols that was referred to by my noble friend just now. There is also a reference to the importation of their womankind. Mr. Skinner strongly recommended that those labourers who proved themselves to be most efficient should be encouraged by their womankind being sent for to follow them, but a complaint has been made that there was nothing in the Papers to show what steps His Majesty's Government had taken in this matter. Well, my Lords, it is precisely because this matter was carefully considered when it was originally proposed to introduce coloured labour, that it was not thought necessary to set forth in the Blue-book all that had been going on between Lord Milner and His Majesty's Government; but I may inform the most rev. Primate that the matter is very far from having been lost sight of. We had the advantage of having in this country a few months ago perhaps the most experienced man in the British Empire in the management of Chinese—Sir Frank Swettenham. Sir Frank Swettenham and Lord Milner had many interviews together, and he impressed on Lord Milner what were the conditions that would best contribute to the morality of the Chinese. His Majesty's Government have sent out to the Transvaal the Protector of the Chinese from Singapore, a man well acquainted with all the requirements of Chinamen, who will do all he can to make the experiment a success. The regulations are not, and cannot be, settled because they have to be arranged in consonance with the Chinese Government, and until that has been done it will not be possible to publish them. Your Lordships will have observed that my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has given an assurance in another place that the matter would be carefully considered, and that he intended to take steps to see that a sufficient number—he is not, of course, in a position now to say what that number will be—of Chinese wives and families should be allowed to accompany the labourers to the Transvaal.

There was another point raised by the noble Marquess on the Front Bench opposite. He asked whether these regulations would be explained to the Chinamen before they left China. Yes, my Lords, of course they will. They will be explained to the Chinamen before they start, not only by people of their own nationality, but by His Majesty's Consuls or by persons appointed specially by the Government to see that the conditions are thoroughly understood. The noble Earl who spoke last gave your Lordships a thrilling account of the conditions obtaining in what he called a stockade. I know what a compound is, but there is no mention in the Ordinance of either a stockade or a compound. The intention is that a representative of His Majesty's Government shall see that these people, men and women, are decently and comfortably housed. I do not know whether the noble Earl advocates that they should be allowed to hold land and engage in trade, but at any rate I do not think that would be very welcome in the Transvaal or in any other part of South Africa. As to the suggestion which was made last night by the noble Earl who initiated this discussion, that Lord Milner's policy was to exclude British labour, there are 10,000 white men working at the mines to-day and at good rates of wages. They are receiving £1 a day, and I think that is quite sufficient to maintain any working man, even with his wife and family and under the expensive circumstances that obtain in the Transvaal. There are some white labourers in Europe who do not get more than 2s. a day. For the least skilled labour 13 guineas a month is paid, and drill men get £32 a month. An important consideration, too, is that white men will not work at unskilled labour under the same conditions as black men.

The noble Earl talked as if there were only white men in South Africa. You have got a black race which is not diminishing, not disappearing as it is in Australia, but which is increasing, and you have got to reckon with it. You will always have—I hope you will always have — the Kaffirs working in the mines, and I say, upon the evidence which is in the Blue-book, and upon the evidence which is known to my noble friend who addressed you last but one, that if you put white and black men alongside doing unskilled labour, the former become demoralised. The true settlement of this question can only be obtained by confining the skilled labour to the white man and the unskilled labour to the black. For every eight black men working at the mines you have one white man; so that if you import 100,000 more black labourers it will provide employment for 12,500 skilled white men, who will bring with them their wives and families.

*Lord TWEEDMOUTH: There is no question as to importing black labour. The question is one of yellow labour.

The Earl of ONSLOW: Well, I will substitute the term unskilled coloured labourers. A great deal was made by the noble Lord and by other noble Lords of Mr. Tarbutt's letter and of the memorandum of Mr. Rudd. I am sorry that the noble Earl had not the opportunity of going through the ponderous volume which the noble Duke the Under-Secretary brought down, for he would have found in it more material for his speech. He would have found that one or two gentlemen suggested that the real remedy was forced labour. Whether it was to be with whips or bayonets I do not know, but I am surprised that nobody has taken hold of that and suggested that, because this or that irresponsible person suggested forced labour, it showed the trial of the Vice-regal serpent. My noble friend relies on Mr. Cresswell and his experiment in the adoption of white labour. My noble friend quoted Mr. Tarbutt's letter as an indication that Messrs. Wernher Beit and Co. were wholly opposed to this experiment of white labour, but if he will read the Blue-book carefully he will find that Mr. Cresswell stated that Messrs. Wernher Beit and Co. did all they could to give him a free hand to make a fair and impartial trial of the employment of white labour under prevailing conditions, but the experiment broke down completely. Nobody would have been more pleased that it should have been a success than those who were so deeply interested in the output of the mines.

Mr. Creswell himself pointed out the reason why it was a failure. He said it was because the white men who were worth anything were gradually becoming skilled men. They would not work at 8s. 6d. and he did not think 10s. would be much use to them, and even 12s. was not a living wage for a married man. Does anybody really believe that it would have been possible to carry on the mining industry of South Africa at a rate of wage of 12s. per day per unskilled labourer? The result would be that the mines would have to be shut down. The efficiency of unskilled white labour, of which a great deal has been made, was shown to have been only 1·23 to 1 of the value of unskilled black labour, whilst the cost was three or four times as great. The only way in which you can deal with white labourers is that they should gradually come to be skilled labourers. Noble Lords who take exception to this proposal can find plenty of material to support their argument in this Blue-book. The Blue-book has not been doctored or cooked. It contains everything on the subject that can be told. There are reports of many meetings and speeches adopting the same attitude as that of noble Lords opposite, but what I want to draw your Lordships' especial attention to is the extraordinary change of opinion which has come over the people of the Transvaal in the last few months. The Report of the Commission came out on 19th November, and since that date there has been no expression of opinion opposed to the necessity—not the desirability, but the necessity—of introducing unskilled coloured labour. On 2nd December the Chamber of Mines passed a resolution in favour of it, and on the 12th of the same month the Johannesburg Stock Exchange passed a similar resolution. On the same day the Johannesburg Chamber of Trade adopted a similar view. On the 18th December a large public meeting was held at Johannesburg at which, by an enormous majority, this policy was supported. On the following day a large meeting in the same sense was held at the Wanderers' Club, and, finally, you have the debate and division in the Legislative Council. Noble Lords opposite minimise the authority of the Legislative Council. The noble Marquess opposite asked, "What are they?" They are, he said, a set of nominated officials who have got to do what they are told by the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I did not say that.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW: Well he said they were nominated officials. Let me say that they were specially enjoined that they were to record their votes entirely in accordance with their opinions, and not because they were members of the Government. What I want to draw the attention of the noble Marquess to is this, that in the constitution of that council Lord Milner was not guided solely, or, I think I may say, mainly, by the question of whether these men were the best men in the colony, or whether they were the men most likely to approve of his policy or his Government. He was guided by the comparative importance of the different elements composing the body politic; that is to say, the members were specially selected as representative of all interests in the Transvaal. Therefore, I claim that this is not the decision of an ordinary Crown Colony Legislature, but that it should be looked upon as really representing the opinion of the large majority of people in the Transvaal.

A great deal was said as to the opinion that has been expressed by the other great self-governing colonies in the Empire. I have had the honour of the acquaintance of the Prime Minister of New Zealand for a great many years, and I think there is no man in whose breast the spirit of Imperial patriotism burns more brightly than in that of Mr. Seddon; but, while I should be the last person to say that it is no part of the duty of a self-governing colony to interfere in the affairs of the Empire, I would go further and say that I think we have suffered in the past because too little interest has been taken in the general affairs of the Empire by its several component parts. I recollect well that in 1887, when the first Colonial Conference was held, a gentleman, a native of one of the Australian States, came over to this country full of hot indignation against the manner in which England had treated the interests of Australia, but when he went back he said he had seen the true proportion which Australia bore to the whole of this great Empire, and recognised that he had been unduly critical in what he had said respecting the Government. The noble Marquess drew a distinction between the Australasian Colonies and the Cape. He said the Cape was more entitled to speak upon this subject on account of its propinquity to the Transvaal. The noble Earl said—but he corrected himself afterwards — that he thought there was not a single person in the Cape who was not opposed to this proposal. On the contrary the proposal is approved in several places. It must be remembered that some of the ports, especially East London, depend for their prosperity on the Transvaal, and I think that if the noble Lord paid a visit to East London he would find that there are a great many people there who are distinctly in favour of anything being done which would maintain the prosperity of the Transvaal.

The noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition gave us fair warning, on the first night of the session, that if His Majesty's Government showed any sympathy with two great classes of the community we must expect some opposition on his part. He singled out two—the great industry which deals in intoxicating liquor and the great industry which is carrying on mining in the Transvaal. No doubt the brewers and the publicans deal in an article which occasionally leads to excesses, though I hope in your Lordships' House we look upon it as the cup which cheers but not inebriates. At any rate, it is a perfectly legitimate business. In the same way, although the operation of mining digs up the riches of the earth which in our classical studies we learned were the incentives to evil, yet most of us like to have a little of that wealth, and at any rate it is a great lubricant of that complicated machine which we call our commercial system. I think that neither of those two classes ought to be singled out for special attack. But it is not in any way because the mining magnates, as they are called, are the people who are mainly concerned in the prosperity of the Transvaal that we ask your Lordships to sanction this Ordinance. It is because by generating the mining industry you create the great motive power which will stir into activity all the other industries of the Transvaal, including that of agriculture.

If by any action of this House the prosperity of the Transvaal is crippled, as I believe it will be by a refusal to sanction the Ordinance, you will have no more reason to make railways or roads. The profits of every farmer, be he British or Dutch, will disappear. As Mr. Birchenough has pointed out, it is not the mines only. As he said, the danger of the situation lies in the prolongation of the present financial strain. It is a race against time. The whole industrial and commercial interests of the Transvaal are involved, and not only the interests of the financial houses. The evidence given before the Commission will strike different people in different ways. The noble Marquess has derived the impression from reading it that there is no unanimity in the Transvaal on this subject. I confess it strikes me in an exactly contrary way. It seems to me, from all I have seen, that the great preponderating opinion throughout the length and breadth of the Transvaal is that, unpleasant and unsatisfactory as it is to have recourse to Chinese labour, it is the only thing which will save the Transvaal from going down-hill to ruin. We have passed through crises in the history of our Colonies not dissimilar from that which we see in the Transvaal. We have learned, or we ought to have learned, many lessons from history. I will not take your Lordships back to the tea chests which were thrown over into Boston harbour, but I will say that whenever Parliament or the Secretary of State has attempted to dictate to a great colony on the eve of self-government, Parliament or the Secretary of State has invariably been foiled, and all that they have succeeded in doing has been in exasperating the opinion of our fellow subjects in the colony. I hope we are not going to repeat the mistakes which were made by our ancestors. You may impose your view on the Transvaal, against the will and wishes of the people, but if you do you will in the end inevitably fail, as you have failed in the past in Canada, Australia, and at the Cape.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, I only interpose for one moment to make a correction. The noble Earl, Lord Carrington, referred to the poll tax on Chinamen in British Columbia. I have ascertained that the tax has been raised to 500 dollars, having formerly been 100 dollars. It is now equivalent to £100.

*THE LORD BISHOP OF ROCHESTER: My Lords, I have listened with great admiration to the spirited and effective as well as kindly-natured and good-tempered speech which has just been delivered by the noble Earl, and we, who feel anxious about this matter, are very grateful to him for the manner in which he has treated what I may call its moral difficulties. He has shown us—I, for my part, certainly did not need showing—that those who are responsible here for these proposals have the most sincere and the most earnest intention of making them work satisfactorily and well. No one has more reason than myself to believe that the Secretary of State and his advisers are fully alive to the serious nature of this matter. The thing we have got to ask ourselves is whether that good intention is altogether sufficient. We have learned from the noble Earl more in detail of the kind of securities the Government are able to take. They are the securities of very high and independent opinion applied to the details of the matter. The counsel of Sir Frank Swettenham and of the other expert, Mr. Evans, the Protector of Chinese, given to Lord Milner, is intended to secure in every possible way the interests of the Chinese labourer. When I ask myself whether that is quite sufficient to make me happy, when I ask myself whether, bearing in mind some of the past incidents of coolie labour, and some of the incidents of Chinese life out of their own country, these securities are satisfactory, I see one or two difficulties.

The first difficulty which I see is the very strength of the case made out by the noble Earl opposite (Earl Grey) for the necessity of this proceeding. I see in that a motive and a force which, worked very powerfully first upon the Government, and then by the Government upon the House, will, if I am not mistaken, work again and again at later stages of the matter. It is largely a financial pressure. I am not going to be so presumptuous as to discuss whether there is, or is not, an emergency. I am very ready to believe that there is, and that it is a financial emergency. The noble Duke I thought last night used rather an unfortunate expression when he said that the Government had no concern with the profits of this or that mine-owner, but that the Government were satisfied if the shareholders were contented. It was not altogether a happy phrase, though I quite saw what the noble Duke meant. He meant, I think, that he was not in the least concerned to get big dividends for the mine-owners, but to keep the mines going, and that in order to keep them going you must do this or that. That is the argument which I venture to think may be brought to bear at later stages upon our responsible administrators at home or in the Colonies. They may be told, when they are getting the Chinese, that if they pay more than a certain amount for bringing over wives and families it will be impossible to work the mines. There is also some reason to think they will be told that, unless they bring so many more, until the total has become very formidable indeed, the mines will not be able to be worked, and evil consequences will follow. Therefore, I do not think it is quite a matter for surprise if, with utmost confidence in the intentions of the Government at home, and the most complete confidence in the intentions of Lord Milner and the Lieutenant-Governor out there, we cannot feel perfectly at ease in our minds.

And then there is this other reason, which, I think, counts for something. You are going to bring a number of members of a less advanced race—a race, as I understand it, of singularly mixed characteristics, with some rather eminent virtues of industry and so forth, but also with some qualities of a very different kind—and settle them in the midst of the life of a rising colony of our own, and in the midst of a race for whom we are deeply and seriously responsible. What will be the effect? We have had discussions as to whether the men are to come by themselves, or whether they are to bring their families. We have had a proposal from Mr. Ross Skinner that the head men should be allowed to bring their families, and some others. We know that that was merely a suggestion. It may be urged with plausibility that no Government can compel families to come if they do not want to come. We are not at all secure against a Chinese barrack life being started there, and there are many palpable dangers in that. Is it going to be an open life, or a closed life? I do not myself understand how the forty eight hours provision in the Ordinance is going to work; but if it means that it is an open life, then I would submit that a very large influence indeed upon the moral life of the community, of the black race, could be exercised by the infusion of the yellow race under that provision. On the other hand, if I have misunderstood the forty-eight hours clause, and it is only intended to be used in rare cases, and the Chinese are to be ordinarily shut up in their compounds, then I certainly believe that there is reason to fear that very grave moral evil will arise, and I am sure that those who have given their attention, as the Secretary of State has given his and other members of the Government have given theirs, to the question, know quite as well as I do, if not a great deal better, what the nature of that is and how great is its probability.

It has been said, though not in this debate, that what is proposed is to have a Chinese village. There are noble Lords in the House who can tell us what Chinese villages are like. I am quite prepared to hear that they are quiet, well-conducted places; but what security have we that we shall get anything like a Chinese village in a compound connected with a mine? For these reasons I cannot say that my anxieties are altogether allayed. I do think that this debate will have had some very real value. I do not suppose it was needed to increase the intention of those in power to carry out this matter in a satisfactory way, but I feel quite sure of this, that there are many parts of society, some represented in this House but many more unrepresented, in which, if we took hold of the first man we met and put to him this question, "Are you content with this proposal to work the Transvaal mines by Chinese labour?" you would find that he would regard the proposal with repugnance and almost with disgust. It may be necessary to get over that feeling, but I do think we have done well to challenge here, and to challenge very plainly, the attitude of the Government upon this question. I am not quite sure whether the noble Earl who has just sat down might not have gone a little further than he has gone. He has told us it is impossible to table to-night all the regulations which the Colonial Governor, with his advice, will come to. I can understand that; but I do not see why we could not be given, on certain points of the greatest anxiety, such definite securities and assurances, if they exist, as would have sent us away more entirely at ease on the matter than we now can be.

*LORD STANMORE: My Lords, at this late hour I do not wish to trespass on your Lordships' time, but as very many of the best years of my life have been employed in removing from indentured immigrants in British Colonies restrictions infinitely less harsh than those which it is now sought to impose, perhaps I may be permitted, without presumption, to say a few words on the subject. My noble friend, Lord Ripon, has brought under the consideration of the House two separate questions. The greater question is whether Chinese immigrant labour should be employed in the Transvaal at all; the other question is whether the Ordinance under which that importation is to be regulated is one which ought to be recommended for His Majesty's sanction. On the first and main question I shall say but little. It is admittedly, as the most rev. Primate told us last night, a very difficult and hard question to tackle; but this I may say, and I am quite sure my noble friend, Lord Ripon, who has filled the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies, will not disagree with me, that in many places the system of coloured immigration into British Colonies has been, is, and I hope will continue to be, of the greatest benefit both to the colony itself and to the immigrants introduced into it. It is nevertheless a system which is always open to abuse, and which always requires checks and guards to prevent such abuse. It is perfectly legitimate when the object of the introduction of immigrants is simply to supply a want of labour which would otherwise be altogether absent. That was the condition under which such immigration was first introduced into the West Indies. But it becomes illegitimate when the immigrants are imported, not to supply labour which would otherwise be wanting, but to supply cheap labour instead of labour at the ordinary rate of wages. It is perfectly legitimate, again, when it is devised and carried out in the interests of both employer and employed; it is illegitimate when it is devised for the benefit of the employer only.

Now on those points the two sides of the House appear to join issue. My noble friend Lord Ripon seems to contend that the immigration in the circumstances of the Transvaal is illegitimate. He does not deny—indeed, I do not see how anyone can deny—that there is, and must be, a great want of labour in the Transvaal, and his opposition was rather based upon the ground of the proposal being unpopular and distasteful to the people of the country than on the ground that an ample supply of labour already existed. I think there can be no doubt that there is a shortage of labour in the Transvaal, for the idea of filling the mines with white labour is hardly one that could be seriously maintained. Again, much of the local opposition to Asiatic immigration comes from those who desire to force into the mines by compulsory legislation, the native population of the province, a course which I am sure my noble friend would deprecate equally with myself. Therefore, on the point whether the importation of coolie labour is necessary or unnecessary, I, for one, should feel bound to give great weight to the opinions of the Commission, the Transvaal Legislature, Lord Milner, and His Majesty's Government. But when we come to the other question, when we come to look at the Ordinance by which it is proposed to render this importation of Chinese labour legal, I take a very decidedly unfavourable view of its character. I deeply lament the absence of one who no longer sits on our Benches, or belongs to this House—I mean the late Lord Kimberley, who for many years led this House both in Office and in Opposition. Lord Kimberley with his almost unrivalled experience of the Colonial Office with his perfect knowledge of the immigration laws, would, had he been still with us, have torn this Ordinance to shreds in a way that I cannot pretend to do. For the Ordinance is not only, as Lord Ripon said last night, without precedent—a statement which I venture to repeat, notwithstanding the denial of the noble Earl who was at one time Under-Secretary for the Colonies (the Earl of Onslow)—but it is contrary to, and in the teeth of, almost all the precedents of similar legislation. It differs from them not only in details but in principle.

These Immigration Ordinances had their origin some sixty years ago. The late Lord Grey, the late Sir James Stephen, the late Lord Blatchford, and the late Sir Henry Taylor were their chief authors. They drew up these laws on principles to which the Ordinance under discussion is entirely opposed. They laid down certain principles which all Immigration Ordinances were to embody. Now, what were those principles, and how far are they observed in this Ordinance? Those principles were, first, that the contract between the labourers to be employed and their employers was to be a voluntary and free one; that every immigration of labourers was to be accompanied by a certain fixed proportion of women; that in the contract itself there were to be provisions which were laid down with regard to pay, rations, and accommodation; and, above all, that they were to be regarded as free men who were to have their own time at their own disposal when not employed in the work for which they were engaged. Now, these were the principles on which the immigration system was founded.

Let us see how they compare with the provisions of this Ordinance. There are, I venture to think, not many noble Lords who have read or drafted a greater number of Immigration Ordinances, or have formed more digests of them than I have—my friend Lord Knutsford may have done so—and I say without fear of contradiction that, at all events until very recent times, of which I know nothing, in every Immigration Ordinance of every colony there were clauses which enacted that certain things were to be placed in the contract of service. I find no such corresponding clauses in this Ordinance. On the contrary, the only clauses which this Ordinance requires to be put into the contract are the restrictive clauses—the clauses that the labourers are not to work at any other kind of labour, that they are only to serve the person introducing them or such person as he may transfer them to; that they are to return to the country of origin, and that they are to be subject to such and such provisions. But where are the clauses as to wages? In all the other contracts to which I refer there is a provision, either that the wage was not to be less than a certain amount, or that it should be at the rate of wages given to labourers not under indenture serving in the same district. I need not say how such a provision as that would work in the present case; but, as far as I can see, there is no provision that in the contract there shall be such a sum fixed to be paid as shall be really a living wage. Nor is there any limitation of labour. In the Ordinances I speak of provision is made that work shall be required only on 280 days in the year and for only nine hours a day. Under this Ordinance the labourer may be apparently employed every day of the year and for as many hours as his employer—I was about to say his owner—chooses.

Then comes the question of transfer. Now, in most of the Ordinances to which I have referred—the Ordinances that were in vogue for many years—you will find that there is a provision that the transfer is not to take place without the consent of the party transferred. There is no such provision here. There is no provision in this Ordinance for consent. Anyone may transfer to any other person. Well, that is not all. For decency's sake a provision is put in that no pecuniary consideration shall be given for such a transfer. I know well by experience how many opportunities there are for the evasion of such a provision. This is the sort of thing which will happen. An employer of labour wishes to get rid of his labour. Another gentleman is desirous of having that labour on his estate, but must not buy it. Oh, no, that is not to be thought of. But the gentleman to whose estate the labourers are to be transferred takes a great fancy, curiously enough, to a horse belonging to the gentleman from whose estate they are coming. The horse is one to which the owner attaches a sentimental value, and he will not part with it except for a consideration which he, of course, considers is prohibitive; but such is the wish of the other party to take it that he will pay the prohibitive price, and, much against his will, no doubt, the owner of the horse has to surrender. Such a provision as this for the transfer from one employer to another, though not slavery (for I recognise the distinction) is certainly serfdom. Depend upon it under this clause men will be bought and sold.

Next, with regard to the question of the passport. I quite admit that the noble Earl the late Under-Secretary for the Colonies was correct in saying that a passport was required in many colonies, but to say that that was the same sort of passport as is here contemplated is quite wrong. There was a tendency in this direction in Mauritius, but a Royal Commission which was sent out there, and which examined the whole state of the laws with regard to coolie labour in Mauritius, at once got rid of all those objectionable provisions, and, although the passport was retained, it was retained simply as an instrument which identified the bearer. Then I see in one clause of the Ordinance that the register kept by the employer is apparently the final evidence as to absence from work, desertion, and matters of that sort. Now, that is a very old story. That is the thing that Governors of colonies where immigrant labour has been employed have been fighting from time to time during the last fifty or sixty years, and in most colonies the provisions of the law have been such as to render it necessary to go before a magistrate to have these things proved. There has always been a wish to have it considered that the books of the estate are to be the final proof. That has always been resisted under the old traditions of the Colonial Office, and I should be sorry to think that those old traditions were now going to give place to an entirely new system. So far as I can see, there is in this Ordinance no provision whatever for any appeal to a magistrate or to any court beyond the Inspector, who is apparently to take these books as his sole guide.

Then I come to the point as to the precedent which my noble friend Lord Onslow attempted to show existed in Trinidad, in which colony he said there was a similar provision to that which it is now proposed to make in the Transvaal with regard to residence. He said the labourers were equally compelled to reside on the premises of the employer. I beg the noble Lord's pardon. Nothing of the sort. They were compelled, if you like, to make the estate their home, but they were not obliged to stay there day and night, and to live upon it when they were not engaged in work. They were free to go about on their own amusements as much as they pleased. I was for several years in Trinidad, and I never saw a coolie confined to his establishment when work was over. One case I remember, in Mauritius, of a French planter, who attempted to enforce something of the régime which will be enforced under this Ordinance, and did keep his coolies shut up on his premises day and night. What was the result? With the full approval of the Home Government, he was prosecuted before the magistrate's court for illegal detention, and was convicted and imprisoned. There is all the difference in the world between having people resident on the property, but allowing them free action as free men to go about where they like, and to go and buy and sell what they like, and the sort of confinement that is proposed under this Ordinance.

And what do you think the result of that confinement will be? I think I can tell you. But first let me say a word with regard to the subject of permits. These permits are to be given for only forty-eight hours. In some of the regulations which were passed in Mauritius, and which exceeded really their legal powers and were cancelled afterwards, an attempt was made to provide something like that system of permits for forty-eight hours only; that is, they attempted to limit the permit, but there is this to be said, that they provided that the immigrant should be entitled to ask for that permit so many times a year. There is no such provision in this Ordinance. It depends wholly and absolutely on the employer. There is no obligation on him to give such a permit from one year's end to another. The language is all prohibitive. He must not give a permit for more than forty-eight hours, but he need not give any on any day in any year. But suppose that the labourer gets his occasional permit, nevertheless he is mainly retained in the compound of the property. You do not imagine that he will be very contented there. There is no body of men so apt to combine, to conspire, and to plot as Chinamen, and these large bodies of men shut up in an enclosure will plot accordingly. You will get a copy of the Roman Ergastula of classic times with all their dangers, all their discontent, all their vices. They will plot and conspire, and in the end may break out, and you will have very unpleasant mutinies and riots; and if that is the case, and they are all put down and are herded together again in these close barracks, they will escape in another way—by suicide. There is nothing a Chinaman is more ready to resort to than suicide. Between thirty and forty years ago there were a large number of Chinamen employed as coolies in British Guiana. Those coolies thought they had certain grievances, and those grievances were inquired into, and to a certain extent confirmed, by a Royal Commission sent from this country, and one of the things which the Royal Commission remarked was the enormous prevalence of suicide among the immigrants on particular estates where they were dissatisfied. If a Chinaman cannot escape in any other way he is prepared to escape by means of death.

In all those immigration laws to which I have referred, and which were carefully drafted, as I have said, on fixed principles laid down by the Secretary of State and his coadjutors, a fixed number of women were always made to accompany the men. Well, in this case the only provision made with regard to women or families is a negative one; and when we are told that Regulations are in contemplation which will alter all that, I beg to inform your Lordships with the most distinct assurance that Regulations cannot do anything of the kind, because they would be absolutely illegal and ultra vires. By a regulation you can extend, expand, and carry out a provision of law, but you cannot go against it. You cannot contradict the letter of the law by a regulation, and the words of the Ordinance are explicit—

> "It shall not be lawful for the wife of any member of the family of any labourer or any family belonging to the race or tribe of the labourer introduced, to enter or reside in the Colony unless they be respectively introduced by a duly licensed importer under, as far as practicable, the same conditions and restrictions as provided by the Ordinance."

That is to say that, unless the employer is willing to go to the extra expense of bringing these women over, there is no compulsion in law to bring them over at all, and as the expression in the Ordinance is positively prohibitive, and the exception gives a statutable discretion to the employer, no Regulation can make it obligatory on the employer to import women. It must be optional. Whether he will go to that expense may be doubted. And if he does, what then? By the provision of the Act they must be put to the same labour and to the same work, under the same restrictions and for the same purposes as the men. Are the women to go down and work in the mines? That appears to be the intention. Certainly it is the wording.

And now a word as to the importer of labour so often mentioned. It is a new phrase to me and its definition is somewhat obscure. Taking the importation clause and the transfer clause together, are we to suppose that a shipowner may bring over, say, a thousand immigrants, import them, and then sell them, a hundred to one mine and a hundred to another? It cannot be intended, but under this Ordinance it would, I think, be possible, and it ought to be made impossible.

I do not wish to detain your Lorships longer. [A NOBLE LORD: Hear, hear!] I accept and appreciate that cheer, my Lords, but when a man has given the best years of his life to bringing about an improvement in the condition of the labouring population of many colonies, he may be perhaps allowed to say a few words when he sees his work likely to be undone, even if a junior official is impatient to be gone [cheers.] What I wish to point out is, that the provisions of this Ordinance, as my noble friend said, are unprecedented and unjust in themselves. Why have you chosen Chinese and not Indians, against whom there is this prejudice? I think we know the answer. You know perfectly well that the Indian Government would never allow Indian subjects of the Crown to be subjected to these restrictions which you are going to impose upon the Chinese. And do you think you will get the Chinese? John Chinaman is no fool. He will ask what the conditions are, and when he finds them out I do not think he will come. If he does come, I think he will give you trouble. No, my Lords, if you want to have immigrants from Asiatic countries, if you find it necessary to employ them, and I for one am far from saying that it is not necessary to employ them—I know how beneficial their employment has been elsewhere, and I can conceive that they may be wanted to supply a shortage of labour in the Transvaal—you must get them on fair terms. You must not go to them and say: "We want your labour, but the people of the country we are taking you to will not have anything to do with you, so you must consent to be put in prison and treated almost as criminals." Your employing them at all may be distasteful to you, but if you make up your minds to that distasteful necessity you must make up your mind also to the equally distasteful necessity of treating those whose aid you have invoked as men and not as machines, giving them some pleasure in life and some opportunities of improving their condition. You cannot introduce them and then keep them wholly out of sight in the mines all day and hidden by the compound walls all night. There is one extraordinary clause in this Ordinance which not only prohibits them holding land or keeping a shop, but says they are to have no fixed property. What is fixed property? Are their wages fixed property? It is clear that even if they get their wages paid them they cannot buy anything, for anything so bought clearly would be fixed property. If you wish to employ these people you should treat them fairly. Give them an opportunity of bettering themselves in the country to which they come. You say it is a necessary evil to employ them. Then you must put up also with the necessary evil of employing them in such a way as shall give them fair satisfaction, and shall enable them to live an honest and an industrious life in the country to which they have come, and not keep them simply for the purpose of servile labour and nothing else. Before I close I should like to offer one observation on a point which has not, I think, attracted much attention, I mean the effect on other colonies. In every colony there is a party desirous of greater restrictions upon immigrants. Till now the Colonial Office has manfully refused to allow such restrictions. With what logic or consistency can they continue to refuse to other coolie-employing colonies what they have granted to the Transvaal?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, my two noble friends have stated the case for the Government so fully and in so convincing a manner that I would not have risen at this stage of the debate had not the noble Marquess, during yesterday's discussion, made a very distinct appeal to me on a particular part of the subject before the House. The noble Marquess asked me whether any communications had passed between His Majesty's Government and the Government of China in regard to the importation of these Chinese labourers, and he reminded me that we are under a treaty obligation to communicate with the Chinese Government in respect to such matters. There have been communications between the Foreign Office and the Chinese Government. They have not been numerous; one of them is a letter to the Chinese Minister at this Court inviting his attention to what is proposed, and his suggestions on the subject. The Minister's reply has reached us within the last few hours, and as the noble Marquess is interested in the matter he will perhaps allow me to inform him of its purport. The Minister writes—

> "The Ordinance in question being a measure affecting the internal economy of the Transvaal, I recognise the courtesy and consideration of His Majesty's Government in consulting me in regard to it before it becomes law."

He then proceeds—

> "I am glad to be able to inform your Lordship that I do not find anything in it that is likely to conflict with anything I may have to propose when we come to negotiate the regulations for the supervision and protection of Chinese immigrants provided for in Article 5 of the Treaty of Peking."

The Minister goes on to make one or two practical suggestions which are entirely in accordance with the policy that has been explained. We shall be glad to lay the complete Papers on the Table of your Lordships' House. The Article of the Convention of 1860 which the noble Marquess had in his mind renders it necessary that before Chinese emigrants are allowed to ship there shall be communication between His Britannic Majesty's representative in China and the Chinese provincial authorities in order that proper regulations may be framed for the protection of the emigrants. That is, no doubt, a precaution of a kind, but I am bound to say it seems to me that those who have at heart the welfare of these emigrants would find a better security in the solemn undertaking given them by the Secretary for the Colonies than in any consent that might be obtained from provincial authorities in China. We have been told by my noble friend that Lord Milner, who has already had the advantage of two consultations with Sir F. Swettenham, perhaps the greatest living authority on the subject, will also have the assistance of Mr. Evans, the Protector of Chinese Emigrants. I think we may fairly anticipate that the result of their deliberations will be to give us regulations that will be satisfactory to the right rev. Prelate who spoke just now and expressed so strong a desire that no precaution should be neglected.

I must say that I regret very much that we are not able to respond to the appeal made to us last night by the most rev. Primate. He appealed to us to give, at any rate, a rough outline of the proposed regulations. All these precautionary arrangements are, however, really questions of detail, and it would be altogether premature until the matter has been discussed, as it will be, on the spot, to offer specific assurances. I cannot help saying that it is scarcely reasonable to suggest that the Ordinance should be suspended until these details have been arranged. Those who make that suggestion have failed to recognise the gravity of the crisis. It is not merely a financial crisis, it is a crisis which threatens every industry and pursuit in the colony, and there can be no doubt that unless early relief is given in some shape the result may be disastrous to the Transvaal itself and to the Colonies which adjoin it. The difficulty is entirely a labour one. It has been shown that the supply of local labour has been virtually exhausted. It has also been proved to demonstration that white unskilled labour is prohibitive in cost and impracticable in its application. There remains, therefore, only the alternative of Asiatic labour. We do not propose to resort to that expedient lightheartedly, or because we desire to see what has been called an indiscriminate influx of Asiatics. But we are prepared to try the experiment on a limited scale and fenced in by every precaution which experience can suggest. The only question is whether these precautions are sufficient or not. As to that, may I say that this debate will not offer to those who have honest misgivings on the subject the last opportunity of criticising what is proposed by the Government? Do not let your Lordships lose sight of this, that these regulations will be drafted by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Colony, that the Lieutenant-Governor is responsible to Lord Milner, Lord Milner to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State to Parliament, and accordingly whatever is done amiss cannot be withdrawn from the consideration and criticism of Parliament. Therefore there will be abundant opportunities, if these regulations should be found to fall short of what is necessary, of criticising them.

One word more with regard to the manner in which this question is regarded by public opinion in the Transvaal. The noble Marquess last night took considerable exception to what I had said upon this point in the debate on the Address, and he said that no expression of opinion on the part of the Legislative Council of the Colony, and no petitions could make up for or replace an expression of opinion derived from a Colony endowed with representative institutions. Of course, that is perfectly true. I do not mean for a moment to suggest that you can get so conclusive an opinion from the Legislative Council or from any conferences or committees as you can from an elected Legislature. But we are dealing with a Crown colony and must get at public opinion in the best way we can. We have done our best to get at public opinion, and we are profoundly convinced that is, I will not say unanimous, but largely preponderating in favour of the course proposed. I guard myself from saying that public opinion is unanimous for this reason, because I know that in certain quarters these proposals are regarded with misgiving. I understand the Colonial Office propose to lay more Papers on the Table showing what the objections are and what replies can be made to them. We believe that public opinion in the Colony has completely changed in the last few months, and it has changed because it has come home to the people of the Colony that unless this proposal is admitted the Colony is threatened with disaster and ruin. And that is the answer to what was said by the noble Earl who spoke first last night, when he rather unfairly called attention to the fact that Lord Milner has changed his mind. Lord Milner has changed his mind because he has become convinced, as we have, that this thing is inevitable. Lord Milner is an official of unrivalled experience, and your Lordships may be perfectly sure that Lord Milner would not have changed his mind if he had not been convinced that a change of policy is inevitable. We, too, have approached this question with the feeling that the admission of Asiatics was prima facie a very doubtful expedient; but we regard it as inevitable, and we rely on the precautions which we are determined to take to make the experiment innocuous to the interests of the Colony.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I do not propose to make anything in the nature of a reply on the debate which has taken place. I am very glad that this subject has been discussed, and I think His Majesty's Government must at least observe that there are some points upon which the feeling in this House, and certainly in the country, is very strong and decided. Therefore, it was with great regret that I heard the noble Marquess say that it would be impossible to withhold the assent to this Ordinance for the present until the very grave questions raised by so many speakers, and especially by the most rev. Primate and the right rev. Prelate who have addressed us in the course of this discussion, in regard to the moral aspect of this question have been settled. I still would venture very earnestly to press on His Majesty's Government to give more consideration than they appear inclined to give to these very serious matters. If the noble Marquess listened to the very important and admirable speech which was delivered just now by my noble friend on the Cross Benches (Lord Stanmore), he must have observed that he showed clearly and beyond dispute that the governing thing in this matter was the Ordinance itself. You may make your regulations, but they cannot supersede the Ordinance, and if the Ordinance forbids any portion of the regulations, the regulations are simply waste paper. That is a very important consideration indeed, and I venture to say that unless the regulations which are made are of a much more decisive, satisfactory, and efficient nature than has been foreshadowed in the course of this discussion, there will arise on this question a very serious and determined expression of public opinion that nothing shall be done which shall be inconsistent with securing, as far as we can, a good moral condition for those who are to be brought in under this Ordinance. I will not add anything to that, but I do earnestly entreat His Majesty's Government to give this part of the question, at all events, their most earnest consideration. It rests wholly upon their responsibility. I understood the noble Marquess to say that these regulations would be laid on the Table of both Houses of Parliament, and that free opportunity, not only in this House, where we enjoy it, but also in the other House, will be given to discuss the regulations when they are laid before Parliament. I had intended to move for Papers relating to the communications between my noble friend opposite and the Chinese Ambassador, but I understood him to say, not only that he had communicated these to us in part, but that they will be laid on the Table and circulated. In those circumstances I will not press my Motion for Papers.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I cannot be held to make any pledge as to what will be done in the other House of Parliament on the subject.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter to Eight o'clock.

Crime in Liverpool.

MR. CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state for the city of Liverpool for the years 1890, 1899, and the last year for which statistics are available, the number of prosecutions for drunkenness; the total number of crimes known to the police; the number of offences against the person; and the number of offences against property, giving in each case the proportion per 100,000 of population; and whether he will state the number of licences not renewed by the licensing justices in the city on any ground between 1890 and 1899, and between 1899 and the latest year for which statistics of crime are available.

Offences.	Numbers.			Proportion per 100,000 of Population.
Persons prosecuted for Drunkenness...	14,680	4,069	5,115	2,393	642	739
Crimes (Indictable Offences) (Known to the Police) Total Number ...	4,227	3,504	4,234	689	552	611

* Census 1891. † Estimated Population.

In considering these figures it must be borne in mind that without full knowledge of all the circumstances and conditions it is impossible to say how far the number of prosecutions for drunkenness can be taken as an index to the amount of drunkenness. The decrease of prosecutions for drunkenness at Liverpool in 1899 is discussed in the Introduction to the Criminal Statistics for 1899, pages 17, 70, and 73. The number of licences not renewed (whether refused, surrendered, or not applied for) was 214 for the years 1890 to 1898 and 195 for the years 1899 to 1903.

Drunkenness in England and Wales.

MR. CORBETT: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will state the number of persons tried for drunkenness in England and Wales for the average of the five years 1892 to 1896, and for the average of the five years 1897 to 1901, and the numbers for the year 1901, and, if yet available, for the years 1902 and 1903, and the proportions of each figure per 100,000 of population.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers Douglas.) The information for which my hon. friend asks is to be found, up to the year 1901, in Table D of the Criminal Statistics for 1901 (p. 31), viz., annual average number of persons prosecuted for drunkenness in England and Wales for the years 1892-6, 175,627, being a proportion of 583·47 per 100,000 of the population; for the years 1897-1901, 204,940, or a proportion of 642·87. In 1901 the number was 210,342, a proportion of 644·84. The figures for 1902 are 209,908, a proportion of 636·16. The statistics for 1903 are not yet available.

Land Purchase Acts—Rejected Applications for Advances.

MR. P. A. McHUGH (Leitrim, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state how many applications for advances under the Purchase of Land Acts, 1885 and 1888, were rejected prior to the 31st March, 1900, for insufficiency of security as distinguished from other causes of rejection; how many applications for advances under the Purchase of Land Acts, 1891 and 1896, were rejected up to 31st March, 1903, for insufficiency of security; and what was the amount of the applications so rejected.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The number of applications for advances under the Acts of 1885 to 1888 which were finally refused on the ground stated was 1,286; the amount applied for was £467,872. Fresh applications were subsequently made in respect of a number of these cases under the Acts of 1891 to 1896, but no separate record of these has been kept. The number of applications finally refused under the latter Acts, to the 31st March, 1903, was 789 for £175,154.

Naturalisation of Foreign Seamen.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will consider the advisability of keeping a record of the number of seamen naturalised in this country under the regulations issued on the 4th August last showing their country of origin, their length of service in the British Mercantile Marine, with, if possible, a note of such as have acquired a domicile in the United Kingdom.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) A record of the aliens to whom the Secretary of State has granted certificates of naturalisation is kept in the Home Office in such a manner that the seamen to whom the right hon. Baronet refers are distinguished from other aliens. This record shows the country of origin, and in the case of seamen the sea-service and the residence in the United Kingdom (for five out of eight years previous to the application for a certificate) required for the purposes of naturalisation. I do not think that any useful object would be gained by elaborating the record further.

Orders for Armour Plate.

MR. J. F. HOPE (Sheffield, Brightside): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether any further reason for delay exists with regard to the distribution of orders for the armour required for the battleships of the current financial year.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) There has been no delay with regard to the distribution of these orders. The provision made in the Navy Estimates did not allow for the placing of the orders before the latter part of the financial year, and this date will fully meet the requirements of the shipbuilding programme. The orders will be placed as soon as the tenders which have been received have had proper consideration.

Twinning System for Turret Guns.

Mr. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): To ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether any reports from gunnery officers of the Navy have been received upon the system of twinning the two six-inch guns in turrets of ships of the "County" class together, so that one cannot be fired without the other; and, if so, will he state their purport.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) These twin mountings were the subject of much controversy and consideration when adopted by the previous Board of Admiralty in 1899, but ships of this class have not been long enough in commission for the present Board to have formed any final opinion on the merits of this particular mounting. No reports from gunnery officers on any guns, whether favourable or unfavourable, can be published, as all are confidential.

Belfast Post Office—Promotion of Mr. King.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General, if he will explain under what circumstances was Mr. King of Belfast permitted, on promotion to the rank of clerk, to retain his place on the list of officers selected to perform clerk-in-charge work; and will his retention involve that a senior sorting clerk and telegraphist is deprived of the opportunity of qualifying for promotion.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The former corps of clerks in charge was composed of sorting clerks and telegraphists, and latterly it was a condition of their appointment that they should cease to be clerks in charge if they were promoted to be clerks or received a supervising allowance. In December, 1899, however, the corps of clerks in charge was abolished, and it was decided that an officer of any rank might be employed to take charge of a vacant office if necessary. Mr. King, therefore, remains eligible for such employment if his services are required; and his retention on the list of officers available for taking charge does not in any way interfere with similar employment of a junior officer if the circumstances are suitable.

Sanitary Condition of Central Telegraph Office.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the room containing the A. and B. Divisions Central Telegraphs has been reported as being in a sanitary condition, with good lighting arrangements, and free from overcrowding; and whether, as the officers of the Post Office Medical Department are responsible to the Postmaster-General for the safeguarding of the health of the staff, he will state when the last inspection of this instrument room took place.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The Chief Medical Officer to the Post Office, who has visited the room in question to-day, reports that it is in a sanitary condition and not overcrowed. Owing to the lofty building opposite the electric light has to be used in some parts of the room, but the arrangements made for this purpose are all that could be desired. He has received no complaints from the staff regarding the room. His last previous inspection was made a few months ago.

British Consulate at Jerusalem—Delivery of Mails to British Residents.

Mr. YOXALL: To ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps have been taken consequent upon the recent inquiry into the condition of H. B. M. Consulate at Jerusalem; and what arrangements are in force for the delivery of letters and packages addressed to British residents there through the post office.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) The inquiry referred to by the hon. Member has convinced the Secretary of State that there are no grounds for taking any further steps in the matter. The English mail is delivered through the Austrian Post Office at Jerusalem.

Saving on Vote for Irish Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state approximately what saving will be effected on the Office Vote for the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland for 1903–4.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Department is not in a position at present to give this information.

Operations of Irish Land Act.

MR. P. A. McHUGH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can, without going into further particulars, state the average number of years purchase agreed upon by the 3,070 occupiers who have already lodged agreements to purchase under the Irish Land Purchase Act of 1903.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) To obtain this information it would be necessary to examine in detail the terms of purchase in each of these 3,070 cases. I have already stated that such an analysis would impose on the small staff at the disposal of the Estates Commissioners an amount of labour which I cannot at present see my way to ask them to undertake, the more especially at a time when they are burdened with many onerous duties in the administration of an Act which has so recently been brought into operation. Reports of the proceedings of the Commissioners will be duly laid on the Table of the House as required by Section 23 (14) of the Act.

Poisoning of Dogs at Howth.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that a number of dogs have been poisoned at Howth, owing to the manner in which strychnine has been scattered about the neighbourhood; and, if so, will he state what action, if any, has been taken to bring the person or persons to justice.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) A number of dogs in this neighbourhood have recently died from the effects of poison; there is no evidence, however, to show that the poison in these cases was maliciously laid. The police are pursuing their inquiries in the matter. I may add that poison has been placed on the lands of two gentlemen in the locality, but in both of these cases the requirements of the law have been duly observed.

Cases before Rathdrum Land Commissioners.

MR. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that a number of land cases were heard by the sub-commissioners in Rathdrum, county Wicklow, last October, and that their decisions were published recently, he will say how many cases were decided, what was the total amount of first-term rents, what the reduced amount for second-terms, and what was the average reduction given.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The number of first-term rents fixed was five. The aggregate formal rental was £298 14s. 0d., the judicial rental £234 16s. 6d., and the percentage of reduction 21·3. The number of second-term rents fixed was thirty-seven. The aggregate formal rent was £2,759 8s. 6d., the judicial rental £2,222 2s. 6d., and the percentage of reduction 19·5.

Output of Gold in Transvaal during January.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state, or if he will ascertain by telegraph, what was the total output of gold in the Transvaal in the month of January.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) The output was 288,824 oz., value £1,226,846.

Asiatic Labour in the Transvaal.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether a limitation will be put to the number of labourers that can be imported under the Transvaal Ordinance; and whether a term of years will be fixed after which this exceptional system of obtaining labour will be brought to an end.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) It is not proposed to make such limitations, which are not contained in the Ordinance.

Mr. BUCHANAN: To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will ascertain whether any further Amendments have been introduced into the Labour Ordinance since Lord Milner's telegram of 6th February and communicate them to the House; and will he have laid before the House a Report of the proceedings in the Legislative Council on the Second Reading and subsequent stages of the discussion before the House pronounces its opinion on the Ordinance.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I am making inquiry by telegraph, but I have no doubt whatever that no further Amendments have been made. I will lay the proceedings upon the Table when received, but I am not prepared to make any change in regard to what I have already stated to be the procedure which will be followed respecting the discussion of the question of Asiatic labour.

ADJOURNMENT.

Resolved, That this House, at the rising of the House this day, do adjourn till Monday next.—(Sir A. Acland-Hood.)

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

[Ninth Day.]

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.—(Mr. Hardy.)

Which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words, 'But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being.'"—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

Mr. BELL (Derby) said that when his speech was interrupted on the previous night by the adjournment of the debate, he was explaining by what means organised labour in this country had expressed itself against the proposals now under consideration, and he wished now to point out how even the unorganised workmen, though they had no direct medium through which to make their views known, had at the by-elections very distinctly pronounced against a policy which was ostensibly put forward for their benefit. The Secretary to the Board of Trade in his very able and remarkable speech, endeavoured to show how manufacturers in protectionist countries produced a hundred tons of some commodity, of which seventy-five tons was for home consumption, while the remaining twenty-five tons was dumped on the British market at a price actually below the cost of producing it here. But the hon. Gentleman never gave any reasons why we accepted those dumped goods. Personally he did not believe that any section of the British nation purchased these commodities except for the reason that they required them either for consumption or for manufacturing purposes. The dumping of these goods worked to our advantage in more ways than one. In the first place, they employed our shipping and our railways and enabled our manufacturers to compete with the foreigner in other markets. He would cite a glaring illustration of the direct advantage of dumping, and of the manner in which it injured those who dumped. A short time ago he saw an extract from a Report of the United States Consul at Frankfort, to the effect that the German papers were complaining that their manufacturers had been beaten by English manufacturers in a competition for the construction and erection of gasometers at Copenhagen. The German bid was £11,250, while the English tender was only £10,930, and it was explained that the English manufacturer had to obtain his iron from Germany; that, in fact, by means of iron "dumped" by Germany on this country he was able to tender at a lower figure and to employ British labour in constructing the gasometers and erecting them at Copenhagen. Now, a small import tariff on that German iron would have prevented the British firm getting the contract, and British labour would have suffered to that extent. He had another statement he would like to call attention to. Mr. Arthur Chamberlain, the brother of the ex-Colonial Secretary, in addressing recently the shareholders of a large firm with which he was connected, said that British manufacturers either would not or could not supply them with the steel they required for the manufacture of tubing. The firm in question employed 10,000 men, and a 10 per cent. tariff on imported steel would add 30s. per ton to the cost of the tubes, thereby making it increasingly difficult for them to compete with the foreigner. It was all very well to declare that the purchase of steel for manufacturing purposes, or of raw material from the foreigner deprived some of our workmen of employment. No doubt it did to some extent, but he ventured to assert that it enabled the employment of considerably more than it displaced, and, as Mr. Arthur Chamberlain had pointed out, in that one case the purchase of German steel enabled his firm to compete successfully with foreign tubemakers and to give employment to some 10,000 men who otherwise would not have had it.

They had heard a good deal about the effect of protective and preferential tariffs in securing more regular and remunerative employment for the workers of this country, but it was a noteworthy fact that the pig-iron imported from Canada into this country was about equal in amount to that obtained from all other parts of the world, and if, in order to prevent foreigners sending any to this country, we put on a protective tariff, the inevitable result would be that Canadian makers would increase their prices and get control of the market. Where in that case would the benefit to the home workers come in? It could not make much difference to them if the iron were dumped by Germany or Belgium or by Canada; they would not get any more employment or any increase of pay. It was estimated that the pig-iron imported into this country represented the output of four Canadian furnaces, and of five furnaces in other parts of the world, so that if we prohibited the importation of pig-iron we should have to set to work nine blast furnaces to produce at home an equivalent quantity. They had been told that the decay of our industries was due to the lack of energy on the part of employers, and he noticed in an article in a recent issue of "British Industries" a statement to the effect that in England the output of a blast furnace was 25,000 tons a year against an average of 61,000 tons for the American furnace, the difference being due to the more modern appliances adopted in the States.

Reference had been made by many speakers to the fact that our exports were decreasing while our imports were increasing. But there were reasons for decrease of our exports other than those which had been advanced, and he would suggest a very simple explanation of the fact that our exports had not increased in recent years of exceptional prosperity. Wages had been high, and there had been an increased demand in the home market in consequence of the improved position of the working classes. He had a letter from a working man, giving a list of the things which he had been able to buy in the years between 1892 and 1898, and that list included a piano at twenty-eight guineas, a suite of furniture at six guineas, a bookcase at two guineas, a carpet at four guineas, a fender, 25s., spring bedstead, three guineas, a bicycle, eight guineas, and so on. Thus one working man during a period of prosperity spent all that money in order to furnish his home, thereby creating a market for home industries and lessening the quantity of the goods available for export. Was it not probable that thousands of others acted in a like manner. He thought that if the tariff reformers, who were pushing forward their campaign with so much energy, would divert their efforts to other channels with a view of extending the number of men who acted as this working man had done it would be far better for the country at large. We are now spending £180,000,000 yearly on drink alone, and of that, £110,000,000 was said to come out of the pockets of the working classes. If by advocating temperance they could induce the worker to spend his money on home comforts rather than on drink, there would be very little to export. Facts and figures did not bear out the statement that protectionist countries were so much more prosperous than ourselves. The manufacture of pig-iron in the United States had fallen off very seriously—to the extent of something like 70,000 tons a month, and the New York correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, in November last, said a large percentage of the smelting works were being forced to discontinue operations.

The Colonial Secretary, speaking on the previous evening, put himself in the position of a glass worker earning £2 a week. But was not the right hon. Gentleman aware that for every workman in this country who earned £2 weekly, there were seven who got considerably less and certainly three who did not get more than £1 a week, so that the standard of living he had set up was not the average standard. They had been given to understand that a protected country was simply a paradise—a garden of orchids where everything was beautiful and nothing was wanting. Yet America clearly was not so prosperous as had been suggested. He would not stop his comparison there. He would take the case of protected continental countries. Herr R. E. May's Report upon the Gerresheim Glass Works stated that in 1900 their exports of bottles were 37,500,000, or 34·2 per cent. of the total, whereas in 1901 they fell to 29,250,000, or 29·7 per cent. The cause of the decrease, he said—

> "Is the tariff, and especially our diminished capacity for competing owing to dear fuel. The fact that neighbouring countries can get German coal at cheaper rates than we have to pay in this country means that our industry is being progressively driven out of the world's market."

Which of those statements were they to accept. It was very difficult to reconcile the two, and according to the German statement the decay in the glass industry was more progressive in Germany than in England. Again, the foreign workman living under protective tariffs was said to be much better off than the British workman, but the facts did not bear out that statement. The respective wages in London and Berlin were—of pattern-makers, 42s. and 21s.; of brass-moulders, 36s. and 26s. 7d.; cabinetmakers, 42s. 8d. and 28s. 6d. He admitted that wages were considerably higher in America, but the purchasing power of money was much smaller, and, having examined into the matter, at any rate so far as railway-men were concerned, he was prepared to say that he would rather be a railwayman in England at 30s. a week than a railway-man in America at £4. Then there was the condition of the textile workers in France. According to the description which he had, the father and mother each earned 12s. a week; there were five children, aged twelve, nine, eight, six, and three years respectively. Rent represented 1s. 7½ .; potatoes, 1s. 2d.; groceries, including sugar and coffee, 4¾d.; meat, 2s. 10d.; bread, 3s. 2½d.; washing, 9½d.; clothing, 1s. 7½d.; milk for the children, 6½d.; help for the children whilst the mother was at work, 1s. 7½d.; a total of 17s. 9¾d. per week. The conditions of the workers in this country, while not satisfactory, were far above that standard, and he was convinced that if either the official or unofficial fiscal proposals were adopted in this country it would be considerably against the interest of the working classes. It would be ridiculous for representatives of labour to take up an attitude of opposition to a protective tariff or anything else if it would really improve the condition of the workers. They were engaged by the workers themselves; their salaries were paid by the workers in order that they should consider these things and give their advice as to the best course to be pursued in the workers' interest; consequently they would be neglecting their duty if they did not conscientiously consider these questions and advise according to the conclusions at which they arrived. He opposed the proposals because he was absolutely convinced that any change—for the present at all events—in the direction of preferential or protective tariffs would be most injurious to the interests of the workers. The position of the German, as compared with that of the English worker, might be gathered from the 1902 report of the Factory Inspector at Leipzic, in which it was stated—

> "The economic conditions of the workers have not improved during the past year. Since the incomes of many workpeople have undergone a further diminution, partly owing to reduction of wages and partly owing to curtailment of hours of work, and since the prices of the most important articles of food have increased, the endeavour to economise shows itself in the diminution of the consumption of meat and the large demand for horse flesh."

Millions of working-men in this country were unable to get much meat at present, but what little they did get was, he hoped, good and wholesome, and he had no desire to see them following the example of the Germans and eating horse-flesh, dog-flesh, or anything of that sort. Articles were purchased because they were cheap. Manufacturers purchased foreign manufactured and partially manufactured goods because they were cheap. Why did not British manufacturers, who always held themselves up as being foremost for patriotism, purchase British instead of German steel? They would probably answer that according to natural laws they bought the cheapest. But surely if they desired to put a tariff on that cheap steel they would ultimately have to pay for it the price now asked for British steel. Might they not, therefore, as well buy it first as last, and so create a demand for British steel? They felt, however, that if they paid the price, they would not be able to compete with the makers of cheap steel in other countries. Hence the same results would accrue if protective tariffs were imposed on the imported article and the cost of production increased here. Even in the Colonies the people found that tariffs were not always to their advantage, as the following extract from the Toronto Globe for 25th December would show—

> "A large assemblage of unemployed workmen, skilled and unskilled, gathered together at short notice, reveals a decided fluctuation in the labour market. The attitude of the Government should be neutral. The workmen have already the advantage of the law preventing the importation of labour under contract, but that is counterbalanced by the tariff on goods, which, so far as it is protective, tends to improve the position of the employer."

That quotation showed that in a period of depression a protective tariff was to the advantage not of the workman but of the employer. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had been asked how his proposals would benefit railway men. Unfortunately, railway men were not the only workers who were not producers. A large majority of the working population of the country were in the same position. All these, including shop assistants and other business people, would be adversely affected by the imposition of a tariff. But in reference to railway men, the right hon. Gentleman said—

> "Railway men, like all others who do not live by invested capital, depend for their subsistence on their daily employment. When there is too little employment in the country railway receipts fall off, railway men's wages go down, and railway men are dismissed. On the contrary, if there is plenty of trade there is more employment."

Whatever authority the ex-Colonial Secretary might be on some matters, he was not a greater authority on railway matters than he (the speaker) was. For sixteen years he had served the Great Western Railway Company, and on five occasions had represented his fellow-workers before the Directors. Members interested in railway companies would admit that the period 1899, 1900–1, was one of exceptional prosperity from the railway point of view; the companies were unable to carry with any despatch the whole of the traffic they were required to take. What was the result? At the same time the companies had to pay such high prices for fuel and other commodities that their dividends were no higher, if as high, as before; and consequently the railway men, when they applied for an advance of wages, were told that the companies could not afford to accede to their request. But under a protective tariff the railway companies would have to pay more for all the commodities they required, and, as they could not get more traffic than they had in the period to which he had referred, they would have no balance out of which to pay additional wages to the men. He could hardly suggest what would be the result if protective tariffs were adopted and the railway companies went to the manufacturers and said: "You are getting higher prices for the goods you manufacture, and we ask you a higher rate for the carriage of such goods." He was inclined to believe there would be great resentment felt even by the manufacturers who benefit by the tariff, and certainly by the travelling public, who would have to pay higher fares. For these reasons he suggested that railways, at any rate, and those directly concerned in them, were not going to benefit at all, but were going to lose considerably if any such proposal was adopted. He would like to call attention to the way in which events repeated themselves. In Macaulay's "History of England" they found that there happened to be a Mr. Chamberlayne in the House of Commons in 1693, and he said—

> "There would be no taxes, and yet the Exchequer would be full to overflowing. There would be no poor rates, for there would be no poor. The income of every landowner would be doubled. The profits of every merchant would be increased," and so on in those days. The present Mr. Chamberlain, speaking at Liverpool, said—

> "I believe that some change of the kind I propose will put money in the pockets of you all. I believe that it will put wages in the pockets of the working classes. I believe that it will restore industries which we ought to have, and I say to you what is deep in my heart, that for that part of the subject, although I am bound to devote to it a great deal of attention, I care much less than for that other side (the imaginative side), and one on which I may appeal to you who are occupied in business houses, for surely you are something more than business men; you are Britons; you are patriots."

Now those words were practically the same as were used by the gentleman in 1693, who was not exactly a namesake, because his name was spelt differently, but whose name was similar in pronunciation to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. It was very remarkable that they should have these speeches and promises; but he had not yet been convinced by all the able speeches that had been made in this House—by those who supported either the proposals of the Government or the proposals outside the official programme—that the masses of the country would benefit by the change if it was made. He was going to quote two authorities for this. One considered itself a great authority, and as to the other there might be a difference of opinion with regard to its consistency. The first was the Daily Mail, which immediately after the ex-Colonial Secretary's speech at Birmingham said—

> "Before we had free importation of foodstuffs the poorest classes were not merely on the verge of starvation, they were actually starving; there were bread riots throughout England, and the nation was on the brink of rebellion. The free importation of foodstuffs and raw materials laid the foundation of our manufacturing and industrial prosperity, and that condition is as essential to our success to-day as ever it was.

The Mail had changed its opinion now, as it had frequently done, but that at any rate was his opinion and his conviction from which he had not changed. He was a poor hand at perorations, and, therefore, when convenient, he occasionally borrowed a peroration. The hon. Member for the Brightside Division made a speech last night that was full of perorations; at any rate there were so many that a number of Members on this side of the House rose several times, thinking each peroration was the end of the speech. He had borrowed as his peroration a peroration of the late Colonial Secretary which conveyed his conviction, his honest belief. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking on this subject in the House of Commons on 12th August, 1881, said, and he endorsed every word of it—

> "I can conceive it just possible, although it is very improbable, that under the sting of great suffering, and deceived by misrepresentations, the working classes might be willing to try strange remedies, and might be foolish enough to submit for a time to a proposal to tax the food of the country, but one thing I am certain of: if this course is ever taken, and if the depression were to continue, or to recur, it would be the signal for a state of things more dangerous and more disastrous than anything which has been seen in this country since the repeal of the Corn Laws. A tax on food would mean a decline in wages. It would certainly involve a reduction in their productive value; the same amount of money would have a smaller purchasing power. It would mean more than this, for it would raise the price of every article produced in the United Kingdom, and it would indubitably bring about the loss of that gigantic export trade which the industry and energy of the country working under conditions of absolute freedom have been able to create."

I therefore heartily support the Amendment before the House.

*SIR EDGAR VINCENT (Exeter) said the debate had been most satisfactory in one respect, for it had shown that there was a department of British industry which was still vigorous since forty speeches had lasted rather more than thirty hours. In this direction they had not fallen behind the vigour and stamina of their forefathers. They had not, however, succeeded in obtaining from His Majesty's Government a clear definition of their policy. He heard the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, but the reassuring effect which that declaration made upon him had been largely modified since by attenuating interjections from the President himself, and by other speeches from the Treasury Bench, which sounded a much less clear note of free trade. Before the debate ended the nine muses who, in the absence of Apollo, represented the Government would probably give them compositions in which the leading themes of protection, retaliation, and free trade would be mingled in various proportions. He hoped that the somewhat discordant sounds which had pained and perplexed them during the debate would be resolved in a chord of full harmony. They wanted not only harmony but clear and definite declarations. They wanted to know whether the Government were prepared to defend the cause of free trade against the onset of economic Mahdis. They wanted to know that the policy of retaliation the Government proposed to adopt was a clear and definite issue by itself, that it was self-contained, self-reliant, and self-sufficient, and that it was no mere instalment of a larger and more extensive policy. If he might employ a simile, he would say they were somewhat in the position of sailors about to embark upon a voyage. They had confidence in the captain and in the statements made by the authority of the captain, but their suspicions were somewhat aroused by the character of certain officers of the ship. Their language was far from clear, and there were some of them, like his right hon. friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland or the President of the Local Government Board, who had a bold buccaneer appearance which led them to suspect that they had sailed the Spanish Main under Captain Kidd, and that ordinary commercial gentlemen would not be very safe in their company. It had happened before now that a virtuous and well-meaning captain had been overpowered in mid-ocean and offered the choice between toeing the line or being marooned upon some desert island. That was not an agreeable alternative to set before the Prime Minister, and they desired to save him from it. Therefore, before they put to sea, let them know clearly and definitely what port the ship was bound for. Before he discussed the policy, he should like to pay a tribute to its author. He had a profound admiration for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, but he admired him rather as an orator—and if he might use the term, as a prose poet—than either as an economist or a man of business. He appeared to enjoy to the full the poetical distaste for figures and the oratorical contempt for facts. The truth was that the unrivalled command which he possessed of incisive diction, and the severe restraint he imposed upon his vocabulary gave a pseudo-business appearance to what were in reality lyrical effusions. The form might be prose, but the underlying structure was of the nature of emotional enthusiasm. He was afraid from the declarations of the breezy socialist who delighted certain sections of the House last night that the right hon. Gentleman's successor at the Colonial Office would not prove to be a more reliable guide on economic science.

The new policy divided itself into two sections, the commercial and the Imperial. He would deal first with the commercial. It was suggested that this country should imitate Germany and America and impose a protective tariff against foreign goods. It appeared to him that the physician had prescribed without making a correct diagnosis either of the circumstances or the condition of the patient. He could understand that in the case of a community in a primitive position regarding industrial development, it might be held that industries required the support of protective tariffs. They were unable to compete in the great world markets, and, therefore, they were obliged to confine themselves within their own frontiers. What was England's position? We had gained our wealth and strength by open competition and by world trade. It appeared to him that there were only two theories of commerce—the national theory and the world theory—the theory of the Chinese and the theory of the English. On the one hand, it might be held that the best for the national community was to shut-out communication from the outside, and to deal exclusively with its own people; but the other, and in his judgment the wider and the nobler theory, was that prosperity and wealth were increased by international commerce and by international relations. He could understand the national view of commerce being held by countries which gained nothing from international trade. Was that our case? We gained everything by international trade. We were the world's carriers; we were the world's bankers; we were the world's commission agents. If they divided the commerce of the world into water-tight compartments, they not only considerably restricted and diminished the total body of trade, but entirely destroyed the trade of intermediaries, and that business was one from which we had derived a large portion of our wealth and strength. The policy of the Tariff Reform League had been supported by quotations from the great German writer List, but he submitted, that writer's teaching was altogether opposed to the programme. In 1840 he said—

> "For England free trade is the right policy. a protective system ought not to be the permanent order of things, but temporary and provisional only. It is in fact a means of industrial education carried on at the expense of the nation and ought to cease with the necessity for it."

Therefore the appeal to the teachings of List in their application to England is altogether beside the mark. Again, the Tariff Reform League claim for their policy all the advantages of the retaliation party. They suggest that by our abandoning free trade and adopting protective tariffs we should increase our world commerce and diminish the barrier of foreign tariffs against us. It appeared to him absurd to suppose that by adopting protection here we should do anything else but strengthen protection in foreign countries. Our foreign trade had been largely hampered by protective tariffs abroad, but it still amounted to a considerable figure, and if instead of the free imports we now admitted to this country we imposed a tariff of an average of 10 per cent., it was absolutely certain that foreign protectionists would take advantage of the opportunity, and would increase the barrier that they now placed against our goods to at least an equal extent. They considered that English goods were dumped on their markets just as the tariff reformers here considered that their goods were dumped here. Therefore it appeared to him that the proposed change would aggravate the very evils of which we complained.

In regard to the colonial side of the question, the German Zollverein was quoted as a precedent to be followed, but there was no anaology whatever. The main result, and a beneficial result, of the introduction of the Zollverein in Germany was the entire abolition of internal tariffs. What internal tariffs would be abolished by the introduction of the policy of the Tariff Reform League? Absolutely none. He would go further and say that, so far from diminishing tariffs within the Empire, protection almost necessarily created them. He would endeavour to make this good in a few minutes, but, looking at the thing from a large and general standpoint, what was the trade of the British Empire now? It amounted in the aggregate, including imports and exports, to £1,350,000,000. Of that amount only £200,000,000 was carried on by protectionist communities, while £1,150,000,000 was carried on by free-trade communities. It was proposed in adopting a new scheme of commercial policy that 85 per cent of the British Empire should abandon their practice in order to conform with the practice of 15 per cent. Was not that on the face of it unreasonable? He was convinced that the closer federation of this Empire, which he desired as heartily as any member of the House, could only be effected on a free-trade basis. The advocates of colonial preference, it seemed to him, saw neither fair nor far. They did not see fair because they exaggerated out of all proportion and perspective the importance of Australia and Canada, and they depreciated to an unreasonable extent the importance of the mother country and of all the other colonies, more populous, in some respects more wealthy, and not the less to be regarded because they were less frequently thrust upon public attention. He had said the result of the adoption of the Birmingham programme would be to increase the internal duties within the Empire. The view he took was this, that if free trade was abandoned as the commercial policy of this country, and if protection was taken as the keystone and the watchword, so to speak, of our commercial relations, it must indubitably follow that both in India and South Africa, and other free-trade colonies of the Empire, similar principles must be allowed to prevail. Did they suppose for a single moment that the merchants and manufacturers of South Africa would allow their territory to become the dumping ground of British manufacturers ? Did they imagine for one instant that in India, where the cry for the protection of the Indian industries was already heard in high tones, it would be possible to maintain the present condition of affairs and insist on a countervailing duty imposed on English goods. The thing was absolutely inconceivable. The only justification had been a belief in free trade. He had endeavoured to elicit from the representatives of the new policy some declaration of their view respecting India. He had challenged them to state what their views were, but his challenge had remained unanswered. They had this really absurd proposition, that a great Empire policy was to be put before the country which neglected the interests, which did not take into consideration at all the views of three-fourths of the population of that Empire.

Assume for a moment that he was correct in the view that you risk the establishment of protective duties in colonies which are now free trade,not only against foreign countries, but also against the mother country, what was the arithmetical result ? What did that mean in figures. Our total exports to the Colonies now amounted to £131,000,000, and of that amount £90,000,000 went to free - trade colonies, and only £41,000,000 to protective colonies. Therefore they risked the imposition of new duties—duties which did not exist now—on £90,000,000 of our exports, and what did we get in exchange ? A possible reduction on £41,000,000. But we now knew that in Canada and Australia no reduction of the tariff against England was in contemplation. On the contrary, they proposed a totally different thing—not to reduce our duties, but to increase the tariff wall against foreign countries. As a matter of exchange, he considered it a deplorable transaction. Viewed from the point of view of an empire builder, it appeared to him that they were proceeding not towards the goal, but in a precisely opposite direction. If they admitted that free trade would be eventually the basis of the federation of the Empire, they were going, not towards Imperial free trade and not towards a Zollverein, but exactly the contrary way. In addition to that, they would set the whole world against our colonial Empire, with which they intended to forbid foreign countries to trade. He would add that in his judgment they would imperil the loyalty of colonial manufacturers, who would come more and more to regard this as a scheme which led them into direct antagonism and rivalry with English manufacturers.

The House had the other night from the Secretary to the Board of Trade one of those delightful speeches which they all listened to with pleasure and admiration, in which he clothed with new life and colour the most time-worn and exploded fallacies. He took the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife to task for stating that excess of imports over exports was a proof of commercial prosperity, and he instanced America to show that a large excess of exports over imports was a sign of great commercial vigour. But the hon. Gentleman appeared entirely to forget that America was a heavy debtor to England and Europe. He omitted to say that that indebtedness of America was estimated by the best authorities at something like £1,000,000,000 sterling, and that the interest on that vast sum amounted to no less than £45,000,000 or £50,000,000 a year, which interest was equal to half the excess of exports over imports in that country. He also omitted to mention that the imports into America were notoriously under-declared and under-valued in order to avoid the high ad valorem duties. That was one of the incidental advantages of a high tariff, that it entirely falsified statistics. He omitted to mention the important factor of the very large remittances made by America to residents and tourists in Europe, far exceeding in amount the sum sent in the contrary direction. If the hon. Gentleman would add together these three totals, he thought he would find that they went far to explain the difficulty. He was all the more glad to suggest this explanation because the explanation the hon. Gentleman offered—viz., that there had been a large transfer of capital from here to America, was absolutely topsy turvy. If that transfer had occurred it would have increased American imports and would have diminished the excess of exports, so that his explanation, in place of solving the difficulty, would have been a considerable factor in the other direction. The hon. Gentleman went on to say that this excess of exports was the cause of cheap money in America; and he suggested the converse proposition—viz., that the large excess of imports in this country was the cause of the dear money which had prevailed here for the last three years. A similar argument was attempted in the City by his right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham, and it was not altogether well received; the reply given by the audience was that the cause of dear money had been the war. He would also suggest that it had been our local and Imperial extravagance. Quite apart from that, let him say that excessive imports could hardly be the cause of dear money when they saw that during the last twenty years England had imported nearly £3,000,000,000 more than she exported; and yet, up to the time of the war, London enjoyed cheaper money than any other foreign capital. And if he might add another illustration from his own experience, he would draw the attention of the House to two countries—India and Egypt—both, like the United States, heavily indebted, and both exporting every year a large quantity of merchandise in excess of their imports—and yet countries where the rate of interest was steadily higher than in those European countries in which the imports exceeded the exports. He would not only say this, but would point to the fact that the dearest money occurred year after year and season after season at the period of the largest exports. He trusted that after this they would not be told that an excess of exports and cheap money were cause and effect. That could only be said by those who were still involved in the old fallacy of the mercantile theory—"Import largely and you lose your gold, export largely and you will become rich." These theories had been thoroughly exploded for now nearly 200 years.

Sir Edgar Vincent.

Might he be permitted to say a few words, before concluding, respecting the Free Food League. They had been subjected to a considerable amount of criticism. He did not complain of that; but he would ask their critics to consider what course was open to Unionists, who not only thought that protection would be disadvantageous to the country, and considered it, at the same time, disastrous.

Party politics? Could they allow their friends to blunder without either protest or warning? He could not hold such a debased view of national duty or Party loyalty. In 1902, when the corn tax was introduced, he opposed it to the best of his ability. He believed that it was a disintegrating measure; that it would necessarily lead to the division which was so soon to come. He believed that that tax was paltry as a financial expedient, and that it was vicious as a principle. What had been the result? Since that date they had had twenty-six by-elections and the Unionist party had fluctuated between failure and disaster. In twenty-five, fate had gone against them; fortune had only favoured them in one, and on that occasion the Unionist candidate opposed the taxation of the food of th people. He ventured to put forward these figures and to draw the attention of his friends on that side of the House to them, not by way of denunciation, but by way of a guide to future conduct. It did seem to him that the writing on the wall was absolutely clear, and that the late Lord Salisbury and the Prime Minister were right in holding that the British people had an ingrained dislike to the taxation of food. If that happened to be the case; if the Prime Minister happened to be right; were they prepared to go into the desert for twenty years while that ingrained feeling was being overcome? But, he based his observations on other grounds than the loss of this or that election. He held that the association of the Conservative and Unionist Party, identified with a cause which, rightly or wrongly, was opposed to that held by a large section of opinion in this country—the interests of the few at the expenses of the many. He saw in that the elements of social trouble and discord, which elements might, for more than any mere electoral results, cause infinite injury. It might be a coincidence, but it should be remembered that in every foreign country where protection prevailed there was Socialism in its various forms. In America the protectionists were identified with the capitalists, the monopolists, and the trusts. Were they on these Benches to be pilloried as the supporters of the capitalists, the monopolists, and the trusts? It would be a profound mistake for the wealthier classes of this country not to realise that the great security of their prosperity and security lay in the general content of the working classes. It would be a poor exchange if, in order to increase their profits, they ran the risk of the destruction of that confidence between class and class that had been characteristic of England since the abolition of the Corn Laws. For his own part he should do his utmost to prevent that Party to which he had the honour to belong from committing what he considered to be a grave error of judgment. And if the efforts of those who thought with him were unavailing, then it appeared to him that the only course consistent with political sincerity was to do their utmost to save the country from the policy from which they had been unable to restrain their Party. He held that protection was altogether unsuited to the commercial needs of England, and he was convinced that in its ultimate results it would imperil the safety, the loyalty, and the cohesion of the Empire.

*MR. DUKE (Plymouth) said that the hon. Member for Exeter had, in the course of his speech, discussed the conduct of the Government at the present time and their attitude towards the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham in regard to their effect on the well-being of the Conservative Party. Unfortunately, his hon. friend in the course he had taken was at a disadvantage, in that he spoke on behalf of a minority of his Party, whose conduct with regard to the fiscal policy of the Government had been, in most instances, condemned—indisputably condemned—by their constituencies. ["No."] Were those Members of the Unionist Party who agreed with the hon. Member for Exeter supported by their constituencies. Why, throughout the debate they had been conspicuously sympathetic with themselves and condoled with by their political opponents because they insisted that they had been almost overborne by what they regarded as the tyrannical action of the local Conservative organisations, which they resisted and resented. Did any hon. Members suppose that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham controlled the Conservative organisations in this country. The right hon. Gentleman would only control those organisations so far as he commanded the adhesion, the sympathy, and the confidence of the Conservative Party. For his own part he had come into contact with the rank and file of the Conservative Party in various parts of the country, and he found they were breast-high for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; and they had no doubt in the capacity of Ministers to give effect to and carry through the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman. He agreed the Amendment was really a question of confidence in His Majesty's Government. His hon. friend drew an interesting analogy between the present position and the case of a sailing ship, in which some of the crew had experience of serving under Captain Kidd, and were hesitating whether it was advisable in the general interests that there should be a mutiny. In that case, no doubt, the captain might have to walk the plank, but the Conservative Party in this House were not serving in such a humble craft. They were serving on a King's ship, and the course of that ship would not be dictated by the lower deck. The crew was not in a state of mutiny, or anything approaching it. It had confidence in its captain, and if the voyage, like that of the old man-of-war, was "all the way and back," the crew would stand by its captain. He did not like to have to deal with this question on the ground of the relations of Members of the Conservative Party to their Leader. He had had a presentiment for some time that they might bye-and-bye lose some of his hon. friends. That would be a matter of great personal regret to him, but there was in this question a far higher and deeper interest than the fortunes of any Party. It was the question of the necessities of the nation, and behind that lay the future of the Empire.

He had not been able to make up his mind, during the course of the debate, whether hon. Gentlemen opposite were really persuaded that there was in the present condition of industry and commerce in this country a cause for anxiety, a cause of danger, and a cause of mischief, or whether their view was that the apprehensions of the leaders of the Conservative Party were unfounded and imaginary. He had read words which fell from the Duke of Devonshire in which he said that the excessive tariffs of other nations had inflicted, and still inflict, a great injury upon some of the principal industries of this country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose Burghs, in moving his Amendment, said he saw cause for anxiety in many things which had happened in the course of the last few years. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were aware, as they on that side were aware, of phenonema with reference to industries in this country which could not be misunderstood. Hardly a week passed but they saw reports of furnaces being shut down and mills closed in the steel industry, not because of any decline in the consumption of the goods they produced, not because of any inadequate or useless appliances, not because of want of enterprise by the manufacturer, not because of any trade disputes on the part of the workmen, but because foreign manufacturers combined behind tariff walls, and by trusts and cartels were able to deposit in this country, at a price with which it was impossible for the home manufacturer to compete, such quantities of their manufacture as to make it impossible for the home manufacturer to continue his undertaking.

Mr. J. A. PEASE (Essex, Saffron Walden) said that there would be an equivalent reduction in the foreign countries.

*Mr. DUKE said that whatever the result might be in protectionist countries, the result in this country was disastrous to the manufacturer and detrimental to the workman. That was a result which they saw repeated with monotonous reiteration during many weeks of the present winter. They had heard over and over again of this firm and of that finding it necessary to establish their works on the other side of a tariff wall. He did not know whether hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had made up their minds that the state of affairs required the attention of statesmen. The declarations of the President of the Board of Trade had been misunderstood by many hon. Members on his own side of the House, and, he believed, by many hon. Members opposite also. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have given the impression that the policy of the Government was to consider whether, at some future and remote date it would be desirable to ask this House if some homeopathic process of remedy might be applied in some glaring instance of wrong. He thought he was justified in saying that that was misstating the policy of the Government. If it were possible that His Majesty's Government could have renounced the view stated by the Prime Minister that this was a serious question, that evil and mischief were now occurring which ought to be dealt with, then perhaps it might have not mattered much so far as trade and commerce were concerned whether this Amendment were carried or not. He did not believe it of the Government. The attitude of hon. Members on Monday night rather reminded him of the story of the benevolent traveller and the mongoose. He met an unhappy man who was afflicted with the idea that he saw snakes. He offered to produce a mongoose which would get rid of them; the sufferer replied they were not real snakes, whereupon the Samaritan explained, "The advantage is that mine is not a real mongoose." [AN HON. MEMBER asked who were the snakes?] The hon. Member must work that out for himself. It did seem to him on Monday night that hon. Gentlemen opposite offered to enter into a kind of make-believe that there was a real danger provided the Ministry would join them in make-belief, and limit themselves to a make belief remedy. He did not, however, think that the country was ready to disregard the phenomena of the industrial situation to which he had referred. That was a question of fact. Every hon. Member who had spoken had felt bound, in view of the knowledge possessed by the country at large on this subject, to admit that there was danger and mischief; and if that were so, was it not the business of the Government to provide a remedy? His only complaint with regard to the policy of retaliation which had been definitely adopted by Ministers was that they did not say to what, and when, and how it would be applied. He regretted that the Government did not see their way now to define the measures they proposed, and the area in the field of mischief to which they would be applied, and he hoped that one result of the debate would be that Ministers would crystallise into some form which would make action possible—the conclusions at which they had arrived as to the particular acts of foreign countries against which this country had cause of complaint, and in regard to which this country was entitled to take action, and the methods by which, in their view, it was desirable that action should be taken. He did not think that the Ministry would find the people of this country, either manufacturers or workmen, uncharitable critics of their conclusions or proposals.

He would pass from the question of fact. No one could have listened to the speeches of the debate without seeing how impossible it was for hon. Members to convert one another. The doctrines of Cobden were accepted almost as if they had been inspired; but he took to himself the consolation that this was a practical question. It was believed in the country to be a simple question, and he thought that the attitude of the people in this country with regard to the authorities which were being arrayed against them was an attitude of revolt. Let them see in the light of the two recent instances how the matter stood, and how the interests of the country were served when we came to govern our conduct in serious affairs by texts and maxims laid down in past times, by competent persons no doubt, but which were texts of human origin. There were two conspicuous instances—there was the instance of the conflict that arose between Canada and Germany with regard to the preference given by the former to this country. That was not settled by reference to economic texts. It was settled in defiance of political economy by the unanimous voice of the people of this country. It was settled in such a way as to prove our determination to resist any external attempt to sever the unity of the Empire by the use of those undue tariffs, undue measures of commercial legislation, which it was proposed by Germany to employ against Canada. Another illustration, which could not be regarded with the same amount of satisfaction, was the corn duty. We happened lately to have a corn duty which did not hurt a living soul in the country, and one day the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that it was to be taken off. The first criticism that reached him was, "You had much better have kept it and established old-age pensions"—and that was a criticism that did not come from anyone on the Conservative side of the House. Every one knew that that tax did not, in fact, raise the price of bread by one farthing, and in regard to that tax a proposal came from Canada which said: "You have got this tax; it does not hurt you, and, therefore, out of that £2,500,000 which you are getting give us something in exchange for advantages we will give you in order to show that you are walking in the same paths with us towards Imperial progress and Imperial unity." That might have been done but for the fact that one Minister in the Government had such exaggerated devotion for certain maxims about taxation that he was prepared to resign his position rather than to consent to this course in the interests of Canada. When men came to consider the effect of what was called the free-trade doctrine, in the first instance, as it affected this country, and in the second as it affected Canada and the rest of the Colonies, he had not very much doubt as to the judgment at which they would arrive and the course which they would pursue. We were not going to be satisfied much longer with a solution of these questions which depended upon the servitude to the letter of a dead and inapplicable text. There had been no such devotion to the dead letter since the time of the Scribes and Pharisees, and he looked for the end of that tyranny.

What was the position in which we now stood with regard to the Colonies? For nearly a life-time the constant cry of the Colonies to this country had been "try preferential trade." That cry, which had been heard over and over again, began in Canada, where they had the American system in full operation under their eye, but it extended to all the Colonies. It was repeated by Ministers of those Colonies at successive conferences, and, down to the year 1896, it met from Ministers of both Parties in the State a flat and uncompromising negative. Then in 1897 Canada, with a courage and devotion not often recognised, on her own initiative gave us a rebate of her duties of 25 per cent., which she subsequently increased to 33 per cent. It had often been said that that was worth nothing to us. But it cost Canada something. The loss to Canada by that patriotic act was £2,000,000 or £3,000,000, which was not a small sum to a young country. The result of that was immediate action on the part of Germany. Germany saw the danger, from the German point of view, of that act and dealt with the matter severely. Now, hon. Members who had read the correspondence knew that it was the present Government who denounced the treaty which gave Germany a right to complain of the action of Canada in this matter. In 1902 this Government, perfectly aware of the desires the Colonies had so long cherished in this regard—desires which had been so long repelled—invited the colonial representatives in London to discuss the case of Imperial preference—a discussion opened by a speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, in which he explained that it was the desire of the Government to take account of this question of Imperial preference and to know what was its practical shape in the minds of the Colonies. It was a relief to him on the previous evening to learn from the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary that the Government had not departed from that position. The matter immediately before the House was to consider whether this Government, which took a real view of real dangers, and which desired to meet them with real remedies, should have an opportunity of formulating its policy, at the same time placing no impediment in the way of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and those who believed in his policy, to prevent their placing his proposals before the country. Then they might be able to say to our brethren in the Colonies that we would walk with them reasonably and cautiously in the path in which we were invited to walk—the path which had proved for them a path of prosperity. The alternative was that they should be left each to take their separate individual course. He would deplore that possibility more than the defeat of the Government or any member of it. He believed that the path which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had marked out with regard to the future was the right path; the goal was the right goal, and it was consistent with the Imperial past of this country. He trusted that it would produce an Imperial, prosperous and beneficial future. At any rate, so far as he was concerned, upon the question of the moderate and cautious proposals of the Prime Minister, which in no way contradicted the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, he trusted that the Government would listen to the advice of their hearty supporters, the great body of their supporters, who had confidence in their judgment and loyalty, and that they would not be afraid of the possibility that a few young gentlemen on that side of the House might perhaps join the legitimate Opposition.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire) said that the hon. Member for Plymouth, who had spoken last, had favoured the House with a nautical simile, and had said that whatever action some of his Party might take he would be loyal to his captain. Which captain did the hon. Member mean? The one who had left or the one who now governed the ship? The hon. Member had told the House that he had been sunk in the depths of despair by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, because he thought the policy of the Government was free trade; but that then he had heard the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary and was buoyed up to the pitch of enthusiasm. He (Mr. Crombie) thought the policy of the Government must be like the mongoose in the story which the hon. Member had told them. It was not real. He had heard the speeches of four Ministers, which were somewhat contradictory. The President of the Board of Trade had said that the policy of the Government was entombed in the breast of the Prime Minister, and so far as the right hon. Gentleman was concerned that might have been the case, but the other Ministers who had spoken seemed to be quite aware of what the policy was. The revelations which had been made by the President of the Board of Trade had shown the House that the Government itself, like the beast in Revelations, was a winged beast, and it was only natural that from such a Ministry they should have an extremely hybrid policy. That policy was to put on protective duties in order to extend the area of free trade. That was the retaliation policy of the Government. If he might indulge in metaphor he would compare the policy of the Government to an imperial pint measure filled with the most potent protection liquor with a free trade label on the outside.

Speaking as a practical manufacturer, the question he would like to ask was how would the policy of protective retaliation or retaliatory protection, which ever they might call it, affect the woollen industry in which he was engaged? They had been told that the woollen industry was threatened; it was threatened by a return to protection. He was not old enough to remember the days of protection, but the firm of which he was a member, during the first forty years of the last century enjoyed the blessing of protection. Those years ought to have been prosperous years, but curiously enough they were years of stress and struggle and adversity, while the intervening sixty years of free trade, between now and then, had been years of peace and prosperity for the business. He admitted that during the last twenty years the woollen imports had grown considerably, but they were imports of goods which foreigners could make cheaper and better than we ourselves. In this country every woollen manufacturer had a speciality of his own on which he made his money, and it did not pay him to manufacture the speciality of his neighbour, and that system enabled the foreigners to take what we made exceptionally well in exchange for the goods they sent here. Although there is a tariff put on everything they used we were able to sell our goods in France, Germany, and America, because we purchased everything we made in the cheapest markets of the world. Free imports were the secret of the strength of the British manufacturer. It was the free imports that made our exports the greatest exports in the world, and now came the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham with a proposal which, if accepted, would destroy the strength of the woollen industry by cutting off the secret of that strength as the hair of Samson was cut off by Delilah. Were they going to put a tax on wool, that was the product of Australia? Supposing the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham discovered that Australia wanted a preference, was it suggested that that preference should be given on wool? Fifteen years ago the woollen trade used to use logwood for dyeing, and they were beaten by foreign dyes, but the result had been that they had imported the foreign dye and could now dye as well as foreigners. His own trade as a woollen manufacturer would be absolutely ruined if it were handicapped by duties put upon dyes, machinery, and carding materials. He looked upon the McKinley Tariff with absolute detestation, because it shut him off from valuable customers, but, while he recognised that fact, he also recognised that it shut out most formidable competitors. The American patent loom, so largely used to-day, was now made in Yorkshire by English workmen and English capital, because the inventor was unable to export it cheaply enough to this country, and had, therefore, to dispose of the patent here. High tariffs threw us into the arms of the Colonies. Thus McKinley and Prince Bismarck had been "missionaries of Empire" and had done more for our trade with the Colonies than the Member for West Birmingham. He did not ask hon. Members opposite to "think Imperially," but to think clearly. If they wanted protection, it was feasible; retaliation was feasible, preferential duties were feasible; but to clamour for all these at the same time was to ask for things contradictory to one another. For his part he was contented with free trade.

MR. LAMBTON (Durham, S.E.) said that it was the duty of the Opposition to oppose, and naturally hon. Gentlemen opposite revelled in a vote of censure. He looked upon this Amendment as a test to the Conservative Party of the principles which differentiated free trade from protection. Parties were always with them, but principles—well, it remained to be seen. He had looked forward to the opportunity of hearing the Prime Minister clearing up the doubts which had exercised the minds of many of his supporters during the past six months, for the right hon. Gentleman was the head of the Unionist Party, and its members loyally responded to his efforts in its behalf. He thought that the Prime Minister of a Government might be likened to the trainer of a racing establishment who was responsible for the training and running of his horses. If the "public form" of those horses was outrageously inconsistent the trainer might be called upon for an explanation. This demand was not necessarily any reflection on the ability or honesty of the trainer, because the faults in the horse might be due to outside influence, or to the animal itself, in which case it was usually drafted from the stable. There was another rule on the Turf. The trainer was fined for every horse that ran in the wrong colours. He could not remain satisfied with the "public form" of the representatives of the Government, for they were not running in the colours which were now printed on the official card. This state of confusion had been going on for some time. He had never complained that they had no "settled convictions," and he thought that it was courageous on the part of the Prime Minister to stand up and say that he had no "settled convictions." But he did remonstrate with the Government that, inasmuch as they had no settled convictions of their own, they ought to have observed an attitude of neutrality to those of their followers who had. Had this been the attitude of the Government? The House wanted a discussion on this subject last year, but the opportunity was refused. The opponents of the fiscal policy were told to bring forward a vote of censure, and this they had now done. In the meantime, however, the Government had given an unfair advantage to one section of their Party. By postponing this discussion in Parliament for nine months the ex-Colonial Secretary had made good use of his opportunity, and the other section of the Party and the Opposition were now attempting to catch the right hon. Gentleman up. Why? He thought that it had been owing to the by-elections, for the cause of which through the death of hon. Members there could be no feeling except one of profound regret. But nearly the whole of the newspaper Press was on the side of the fiscal reform advocates, and if there had been no by-elections to test the feeling of the country, it would have been believed abroad that the ex-Colonial Secretary was sweeping the country. He was convinced that the opinion would have gone forth to the world that Great Britain was a protectionist country and that all the Colonies had adopted the policy of the right hon. Gentleman. That would have caused more dislocation of trade than had already taken place. He wished the Government to consider their position. The Government knew well that a large section of their Party was opposed to the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman. Personally he had been treated with scant courtesy by the Liberal Unionist Party in his constituency. No word of sympathy or of help had come from the Government; all the sympathy and assistance had come from the other side. He now asked the Government to consider the forces they had to contend with, because they were very great. It was said that all the business men were against the free-traders, and he had read in the newspapers that an hon. Member was reported to have said, referring to the right hon. Member for East Fife, that he was only a lawyer and could not have a sound opinion on this subject, that the country had been too long governed by lawyers and the aristocracy.

MR. RENWICK (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Hear, hear!

MR. LAMBTON, continuing, said the same hon. Member told them that the sons of Dukes were going about opposing the ex-Colonial Secretary because they knew that the doom of the lawyers and the aristocracy was sealed. A few weeks later the hon. Member for Newcastle took a prominent part in the election at Gateshead; and in its results he congratulated the hon. Member on the doom of the aristocrats there. They had also been called Cobdenites, and he wished to inform these hon. Members that he was not a Cobdenite, but a free-trader. Free trade was no more invented by Mr. Cobden than protection was invented by the ex-Colonial Secretary. The predictions of Mr. Cobden had no more to do with him than the predictions of Mother Shipton. It was also said that Mr. Cobden made many mistakes; but the modern missionary of protection had made more mistakes in six months than Mr. Cobden did in the whole of his career. The Secretary to the Board of Trade had taken up the "all fools" argument of the ex-Colonial Secretary to the effect that nearly every country was protectionist except ourselves; therefore it was asked, "are they all fools?" The same argument was used in this House the other night. How far did the hon. Gentleman mean to carry his opinion, for it could not only be applied to the fiscal question? There were other subjects in which we might copy foreign nations. If the Secretary to the Board of Trade envied these countries their protection, did he also envy them their conscription, their morals, or their religion? The members of the Christian Church were in a minority in the world, but did the hon. Member contemplate a pilgrimage to Mecca with a hankering after the harem of the Turk? That was an argument that might be carried too far. He was not one of those who wished "to think continentally." That was the saying of an American statesman quoted by the ex-Colonial Secretary. He preferred the saying of a famous Englishman, not an imported saying. John Milton, the great poet and statesman, said—

> "Let England never forget her precedence in teaching nations how to live."

The free-trade Unionists had had to contend not only against poetry and songs, but against the literature of the Tariff Reform League, and in that the league was supreme and unapproachable. Then the letters of Sir Henry Howorth must have an effect on any cause which he espoused —an effect which was quite incalculable. Those letters would be invaluable to the historian of the future who wished to depict the manners and customs of the tariff reformers. Among other letter-writers, the hon. Member for Central Bradford had taken under his protection the Prime Minister and the trade of Bradford, while the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells had performed the same kindly office for the late Colonial Secretary and the county of Kent. From the latter hon. Member a letter generally appeared at the necessary moment, and it received an answer from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. The hon. Member asked in one letter if protection would be extended to hops, and he received an answer that hops would be considered. Did the hon Member for Central Bradford agree with that dictum of his leader?

MR. WANKLYN (Bradford, Central): Perhaps I shall have an opportunity of replying later.

MR. LAMBTON suggested to the hon. Member that it would be conducing to the prosperity of the country to have high-priced hops in Kent and high-priced beer in Bradford. But Kent did not live by hops alone. It was one of the largest sheep-producing counties in England. The hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells had been thinking of hops; but suppose his brain should turn to wool. Would the hon. Member for Bradford support a tax on wool for the benefit of Kent? In one of Mr. Joseph Brailsford's letters there was the statement that foreign countries were wiser than we, because when they had a boom they kept it to themselves. But how long had the interests of the producer been such a matter of great consideration? A few years ago there was a boom in coal which was not received with much favour by hon. Gentlemen, and in which the coal producer did not meet with much sympathy. It was even suggested that as the miners had benefited by the war it was fair to tax them. The ex-Colonial Secretary made a speech and referred to this point. He went down to Birmingham and there he stated that the duty on coal was paid either by the coalowners or the foreigners who bought the coal. That was the opinion of the ex-Colonial Secretary. The President of the Board of Trade suggested that the miners of this country had benefited by the war, and said that as they had benefited it was only fair to tax them. Was the same principle to be followed in respect of any particular trade that benefited by retaliation? That was one of the questions which would have to be considered by the Tariff Commission.

He had told his constituents that he should oppose any advance in the direction of the late Colonial Secretary's policy. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, he admitted, was actuated by high motives and he had dreamt of a mighty Empire. Other people had dreamt of great Empires, and some countries had waded through oceans of blood to gain them, but the ex-Colonial Secretary proposed to gain this mighty Empire by restrictions on trade. He did not think that was a wise plan. The right hon. Gentleman had underrated the loyalty of the Colonies, which had never been greater than in recent years. If Queen Victoria's name had been received throughout the English-speaking world with such enthusiasm, why was it? Because she was the freedom-loving Sovereign of a free people, and not because of anything she could give. When his constituents asked him whether he was in favour of the Prime Minister's policy, he replied that his intellect was not acute enough to follow that policy. But he gave a definition of his own policy which was practically that of the President of the Board of Trade without the protectionist part. He said to his constituents that he would go so far, but not an inch further; that he would oppose those members of the Government who supported the policy of the ex-Colonial Secretary, and that he would ask the Prime Minister to choose between such Ministers and himself. The House had heard a remarkable series of speeches from this free-trade Government. A great deal had been written on the slate, but each Minister rubbed off what the one before him had written. Adapting some well-known lines, he might say of the Government—

> "You may break, you may shatter, the slate if you will
> But the scent of protection will hang round it still."

He loyally supported the policy of the Prime Minister as announced by him, but he objected to that policy being made a stepping-stone to a further policy. He intended to vote for the Amendment. He did not know how he stood in the books of the Whips; but he maintained that he was acting with perfect loyalty to the Government, to his principles, and to his Party in taking that course. He had been one of the first on that side to warn the Government against tampering with free-trade principles. Three years ago, when they introduced this change in the fiscal system of the country by their export duty on coal, he begged them not to taste blood, and he told them what the inevitable end would be if they did. If that end was now in sight it was not his fault, and he was not responsible, and he was perfectly convinced that, if he supported the Government on this occasion, he would not be doing his duty either to his constituents or to his own conscience.

*Mr. RENWICK said he had read in a newspaper that in this debate no star was to speak to-day. When he read that he said "Thank heaven, we have had enough of stars in the debate." He sincerely hoped that they were going now to have speeches of a practical character. He thought that had been the case so far with the debate to-day. The hon. Member for South-East Durham had referred to speeches which he himself had made in Newcastle and Gateshead. In answer to what the hon. Member said, he would say first that he took a considerable and an active part in the Gateshead election, and he thought there was nothing to be ashamed of in connection with the result. The Unionist candidate polled 1,304 votes more than ever a Unionist polled in the constituency before. In the face of figures like these, who could say that the fiscal proposals were losing to the Party any of their followers? But there was something else in connection with the Gateshead election which would be heard of in this House hereafter, and that was that the election was not fought on the fiscal proposals, but on the question of Home Rule. It was claimed by the Leader of the Home Rule Party as a direct victory for Home Rule. In a speech made after the election, he himself said, and he repeated the statement now, that the Member for Gateshead had sold himself body and soul to the Home Rule party. The hon. Member for South-East Durham had also said that, in referring to a speech of the hon. Member for East Fife he asked, "What do lawyers know on the subject?" adding that we had been too long ruled by lawyers. He wished to tell the House he was speaking then under a sense of what he felt to be a slight on the manufacturers of this country, when he found that sons of Dukes and other members of the aristocracy were going about the country telling manufacturers that they did not understand their business, and that they ought to employ better machinery and better methods. He was proud that he did say, "What on earth do they know of manufacturers, and the struggles of manufacturers?" What did they know of the ruin of factories, even in the Tyneside district? He recently accompanied the Mayor of a Tyneside borough to a new forge which was fitted up with the latest machinery at a cost, he thought, of £50,000. Not one piece of the machinery there had ever been turned on except for experimental purposes, and this was entirely owing to imports from Germany which came into our markets. That was a forge which if in operation, would give employment to between 300 and 400 men. Such forges were not only on the Tyne, but also on the Wear, and in the district. They were told by an hon. Member opposite of the prosperity of the chemical industry in which he was interested, but he did not tell them that his company were the possessors of a most valuable monopoly, and that other manufacturers could not use the same patent. The hon. Member also did not tell them that while his company was so prosperous and paying from 50 to 100 per cent., in recent years other chemical manufacturers had to close their factories. Nor yet did he remind the House when he talked of the chemical industry of the Tyneside that, by the new Russian and Austrian tariffs, duties of from 100 to 200 per cent. would be imposed on manufactures from Tyneside, which would entirely destroy the export to those countries. Facts like these made them indignant when they were told by lawyers and young aristocrats how they should conduct their business. He knew these hon. and right hon. Gentlemen had done good service to the State, but do not let them go down to the country to teach manufacturers their business.

He wanted to make his position perfectly clear in regard to the vote which he was going to give in that division. He was a supporter—a loyal supporter, he trusted—of His Majesty's Government, and therefore he should vote against the Amendment. But besides being a supporter of the Government in their policy of negotiation and retaliation he was in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and he considered there was nothing inconsistent with regard to their conduct in that matter, nor inconsistent in the attitude taken up by the Government. They quite acknowledged that the country was not yet ripe for the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; but he did believe it was ripe for the policy of retaliation and negotiation. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for Derby, who would welcome foreign goods dumped into this country, he asked the hon. Member if he would equally welcome the foreign workman who made the goods, because he thought it would be better for the country as a whole if the goods were made in this country by foreign workmen rather than that they should be made abroad, since in that case the money earned would be spent in this country rather than in a foreign country. Was it not the fact that foreign imported goods fixed the prices of the home produce? Undoubtedly they did. Then was it not inconsistent and illogical on the part of the trades unionists that they should allow these goods made by men working longer hours for less wages to come into the country free of any duty whatever? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton stated that our free-trade policy had been ratified by the unparalleled prosperity of the country, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon said the result of it had been that we had wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. An hon. Member opposite had reminded them that they ought to read their Hansard. He had been taking that advice, and he found that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, on 13th May, 1902, said—

> "Thirty per. cent of the population has been shown to be in a state hovering on a verge of poverty if not actually plunged into it, and it is these people who will suffer."

He found also that on 22nd April, 1902, the hon. Member for Derby said—

> "Not only are there a large number of workmen employed at 18s. and 19s. per week, but here in London alone there are about 500,000 people always out of employment, and taking the whole country throughout we find by the returns that there are nearly 1,000,000 workmen always out of employment."

Did these people participate in the wealth beyond the dreams of avarice? Did they thank Heaven that we had had unparalleled prosperity because of free trade? Ask the 1,000,000 people out of employment what their opinion was. The hon. Member for Derby had asked what railway men had to gain by any alteration in our policy. As long as there were 1,000,000 people out of employment there would always be more people demanding work on railways than the railway companies could give, and so the rate of wages would be kept low. He was told that there was doubt as to the state of poverty in the country. He had taken the trouble to ascertain what the hon. and learned Member for South Shields said in regard to that matter. In the debate on the corn tax on 12th May, 1902, the hon. and learned Member called attention to a speech by the Member for West Monmouth on the number of paupers end people on the verge of destitution. He said—

> "We are able to give the proportion of that underfed class with extreme precision. When I last addressed the House on this subject on the night of the introduction of the Budget, I gave some figures from Mr. Rowntree's book with regard to the population of York. I pointed out that by a most admirable calculation Mr. Rowntree had given the family budgets of 1,465 families. He showed that these people were systematically underfed.."

He also pointed out that the dietary of these people was systematically and necessarily less than the workhouse scale of diet. Had they then reason to bless the so-called unparalleled prosperity and wealth beyond the dreams of avarice? He maintained that as long as they had 1,000,000 people out of employment and others always on the verge of starvation, there was ample justification on their part for having raised this most important question. He maintained that the fiscal proposals should be carefull considered when there was such a lamentable state of things always in our midst. It was a state of things which imposed very great responsibility on the labour leaders in this country. He sincerely trusted that they would state what they proposed as an alternative policy to that now before the country for dealing with this important matter. The junior Member for Oldham said he also knew that a large number of people were on the verge of starvation in his constituency. He was a popular, clever, and accomplished young man, and, although an aristocrat, he acknowledged he had a great future before him. Considering such a state of things, had he been endowed with the hon. Member's advantages, he would have taken the advice of the Colonial Secretary on the previous day not to close the door to colonial preference, because the object of that policy was to eventually make the Empire self-sustaining. He thought his conduct so far had been such that he had made it impossible for him to join any Government on the Unionist side for many years. He might accept a position on the other side, but when he was asked to support Home Rule he would find that the cheers would not come from the other side. The hon. Member speaking in this House on 12th May, 1902, said—

> "Every argument which could be used against the corn tax would be equally applicable to the tea tax. I have listened to the frequent quotations which have been made from Mr. Rowntree's book, which must have impressed everyone who has read it. In all these pitiable budgets of the poor, tea figures as universally as bread. Do not mix sentiment up with taxation. In taxation what is required is equity, and sentimental notions ought not to be allowed to prevent any Government from taking the correct financial course. The only chance the struggling millions of whom we read in Mr. Rowntree's book and whom we see in our own constituencies ever have of enjoying the bounties of nature and science lies not in any socialistic system of taxation, not in any charitable enterprise, or charitable immunity from taxation, but solely and simply in an effective and scientific commercial development."

He agreed with the hon. Member this was not a matter of sentiment. It was in the development of our commerce that he believed this country would find its strength in future. He did not believe it would be done merely by better education, as some hon. Members told them. He asked was it because of their better education, that they had protection in the protectionist countries? The first thing they had to find was work for those who required it. He reminded the free-traders that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had stated that he would take great care that whatever happened the food of the people should not become dearer. He believed this and if he thought the food of the poor would cost one penny more than at the present time he would not support his policy.

*MR. HENDERSON (Durham, Barnard Castle) said he would not have ventured to take part in this important debate, seeing that he was a comparatively young Member of the House, but in so many of the speeches to which they had listened from the other side of the House, reference had been made to the interests of the workers of the country, that he had come to the conclusion that it was time that the workers spoke on their own behalf. The hon. Member who had just sat down had thrown out a good many challenges to the labour leaders. If the House would listen to those who directly represented the workers, he thought they would be able to prove that the workers were directly opposed to the policy the hon. Member just laid down. If, as he and others said, this policy was being propounded on behalf of the workers of the country, it seemed very strange that every means afforded the workers of demonstrating their opinions had shown that the workers were directly opposed to the attitude he and others had adopted. Reference had been made to recent by-elections. He would certainly like to allude to two of them. Hon. Members must be aware that shortly after the policy suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Colonial Secretary a by-election took place in a northern constituency called Barnard Castle. There were three candidates. Two candidates were against the policy advocated by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House and one in favour of protection. What was the result? Although there were two free-traders against one protectionist, the protectionist failed to be returned. That was an emphatic answer on behalf of the working people so far as that constituency was concerned. But another election had occurred to which reference had been made, he meant at Gateshead. The hon. Member for Newcastle had tried to convince the House that he was exceedingly anxious for the working men of this country, but he showed that anxiety in a most marvellous fashion, because he went down to that constituency and did all in his power to secure the defeat of the representative of the working men, and to secure the return of the representatives of a section of the community whose whole interest was against that of the working people. Perhaps the hon. Member was not aware that only two days ago an important conference had been held in Bradford which represented directly over 1,000,000 of the workers of this country. If he might be pardoned for saying so, that conference represented more directly the workmen of Great Britain than any other conference that had been held. It was generally known that they were in the various constituencies, entirely independent of the old orthodox political Parties, and therefore it could not be said, as in the past, that that conference represented the satellites of one political Party. At that conference a resolution was proposed on the lines of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman now before the House, and another motion was proposed on very much the same lines advocated on the Government benches. What was the result of the vote? 970,000 were in favour of practically the Amendment now before the House, and only 27,000 in favour of the position advocated on the other side of the House. He maintained that that was an indication of the mind of the workers of the country on this great and important question.

He had listened with some interest to the speech which had been delivered by the hon. Gentleman, who represented the constituency in which he had resided for many years, and in reply to the hon. Gentleman he would trouble the House with a few statistics. The doctrines now preached by the junior Member for Newcastle had been served out for twenty years by his predecessor, Sir Charles F. Hammond, and during the whole time covered by Sir Frederick Hammond's speeches, which period had been referred to by the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, between 1871 and 1901, the population of the counties of Northumberland and Durham increased by 67 per cent., and the number of males increased in that time by 194,902—in fact, almost double. The increase in the number of men employed in the Tyne shipyards was from 2,423 in 1880 to 6,657 in 1900. He held that that was a fair index of the number of men employed in the North-eastern shipbuilding yards. The number of men employed in the shipyards had increased from 5,423 to 14,777, and the total tonnage built on the Tyne had increased from 361,326 tons in 1880 to 865,274 tons in 1900. The wages in the trade, with which he had been officially connected for the last twenty years, had risen from 30s. to 37s. During the debate many statements had been made as to the ruin of certain industries in this country. He wished to give an illustration from his experience. He had spent sixteen years of his life in the foundry of a firm of locomotive engineers and was cognisant with the various departments in these works. Many hon. Gentlemen in the House knew that these works held the highest position in the world in turning out locomotives. They were in a position to refuse orders for years, resting on the reputation that they had built up; but there came a time when they could not get orders. Other firms in Glasgow and elsewhere with modern appliances undertook to complete a locomotive engine in a week all the year round, while the firm to which he had referred could not do so. As a matter of fact the Stephenson Locomotive Engineering Works had recently been transferred from the Tyne to Darlington, the town in which he himself lived, and had been organised with up-to-date machinery. Not only were many establishments carried on with obsolete machinery, but their management was altogether inefficient. Formerly the employer stood in close relation to his workman, but now-a-days the limited liability director came upon the scene, and managers of works were appointed who had no practical experience of the business. The result was that the efficiency of the work and the output fell off, but surely free trade was in no way blamable. Then a great deal had been said about higher wages for the workers—well, he had been engaged for the last twelve or fifteen years in arranging the rate of wages in a particular trade by means of a conciliation board. His experience was that an advance of wages was not always got when trade was good. Would the hon. Gentleman, who said that he was so much interested in the poor working men, back up his views by voting for the Resolution which his hon. friend Mr. Paulton had introduced in behalf of the trades unions in this country? His experience was that good trade had not always brought increased wages, unless organisation had been good also. It was not more restriction on trade he desired, but less restriction. If hon. Gentlemen opposite would turn their attention to royalties, and railway rates, they would approach real remedies and would help the manufacturers without penalising the mass of workers in this country. He and those who agreed with him had no Whip to obey, but were ready to act with either side on a question of improving the condition of workers of this country, but they felt on this occasion that they must go into the Lobby and vote emphatically in favour of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose.

MR. BECKETT (Yorkshire, N.R., Whitby) said he wished to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the speech which he had made. The subject under debate had been discussed at portentous length, and he did not wish to trespass unduly on the attention of the House, but, speaking from the point of view of the bankers, he thought that it was rather remarkable that, wide as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had spread his net, he had not been able to capture a single banker to serve on that committee of political blacksmiths who were engaged in forging fetters for British industry—[MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh; oh!"]—and who, if they had paid any attention to the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, must now be pursuing their labours with somewhat heavy hearts. Bankers had a peculiar right to speak on this question, because they were not interested professionally in one particular trade. They were interested in all trades, because their fortune rose and fell with the fortunes of the commercial community as a whole. He wished to speak, not on behalf of the bankers of London, who represented the greatest money market of the world, but on behalf of the country bankers, whose fortunes entirely depended upon the industries which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham declared were about to be ruined.

They had had a long recital about ruined industries, and in listening to the hon. Member for Newcastle he had been struck with the significant omission which that hon. Gentleman had made of the shipping industry. The hon. Member was connected, he believed, with the shipping industry, and that was one of the biggest, if not the very biggest, industry in the country. But they had not heard from the hon. Member for Newcastle one single word about it. Why was that? It was because the hon. Member knew full well that the shipping industry was in a prosperous condition. This omission of the very industry with which the hon. Member was connected was an exemplification of the mode of argument adopted by protectionists all over the country. The industries which were not in a flourishing condition were the industries, of course, which cried out that they were being ruined. Now, those who argued that our industries were being ruined had to prove, first that the proportion of ruined industries as compared with the flourishing industries was something more than infinitesimal; then that the ruin of industries was foreign competition, not home competition and effete methods and business inefficiency, and finally that the disappearance of such ruined industries was not soon followed by the emergence of others better equipped, with larger profits, and affording greater employment. When protectionists had proved these three things, their arguments would have some value, but not till then. It was not the ruined industries that caused alarm to the right hon. Member for Sleaford: it was the great increase, as he said, of the wealth of Germany and the United States. He should have thought that it was rather late in the day to trot out that argument in the House of Commons. The Prime Minister himself had disposed of it effectually once for all, by showing that it was to our advantage to deal with the people who were well off, even if they were protected countries. Every one knew perfectly well that even in protected countries there were periods of depression. Trade must contract and expand; it was the law of nature. In this country there were some signs of contraction, but there were no signs of decay. There was no necessity to throw ourselves into a state of alarm and rush to the adoption of quack remedies for that contraction. The causes of that contraction were perfectly well-known. He would specially mention the late war. They could not throw away £250,000,000 without feeling the effects of it after. America had not thrown away £250,000,000, and yet she was suffering from a great depression in trade, and he was told that there was a greater amount of unemployment in that country than in this. Last year, when American exports reached the highest figure ever known, and when Germany exported more than in its previous history, there was the greatest depression in employment. The reason was that when the home market was unable to take up the goods produced, the manufacturer had to rush and sell his goods abroad. The test of a nation's prosperity by the amount of its exports was utterly fallacious.

It was a business maxim that if you took care of the consumers the producers would take care of themselves. When the consumer was prosperous the whole community was prosperous; but the producer might be producing a great deal, and yet the community be impoverished. How they were to get prosperity out of that policy he was unable to understand. Then it was said that it would create more work for the workmen. It would make more work only in the sense in which an ultimely shower of rain on the farmer's hay made more work for the farmer. Besides, where was the fund out of which they were going to pay higher wages for labour? That point had not yet been explained by the right hon. Gentleman. Another argument advanced in favour of the policy was that we had not a fair share of the world's commerce. It seemed to him that we had infinitely more than our fair share as the figures stood at present. Our trade with all the world last year was £900,000,000 for a population of 40,000,000, while the foreign trade of Germany and America with a population of 133,000,000 was only £979,000,000. Therefore, our trade was three times as great per head as the trade of Germany and America. It could not be contended that an Englishman had three times as much talent, energy, or capital as the American or German; consequently that extra share of trade must be due to our free-trade system and nothing else. The arguments of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to dumping had been refuted again and again. The argument against dumping by foreign countries meant that the cheaper the goods we imported the more zealously should we strive to keep them out. People bought goods because they wanted to have them cheap, and their cheapness enabled the manufacturers to make profitable use of them, and upon it the prosperity of various industries had been built up, but if they placed a heavy duty on these cheap goods, many industries would be injured to the advantage only of a few. He would like to ask his protectionist friends whether or not they contended that a protective tariff kept out "dumped" goods. According to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the Colonies were suffering from dumping; therefore protective tariffs did not prevent it.

The conclusion he had come to was that the keener the competition to which this country was exposed the more closely ought the people to adhere to free trade. The Government, however, did not take that view. They thought that they could mitigate the pressure of foreign competition by a policy of retaliation. He disliked the word retaliation, he disliked introducing the phraseology of war into a question of trade, and he disliked the thing still more. It was vague, uncertain, partial, arbitrary, and hazardous. No member of the Government had defined what retaliation meant. The President of the Board of Trade had stated that it would be sufficient to threaten, but he predicted that the tariff walls of foreign nations would not collapse at the blast of the ram's horn blown by the President of the Board of Trade. Threats would be no more successful in the sphere of commerce than they had been in the political sphere. The Colonial Secretary had reproached the free-traders for saying at one moment that retaliation meant much, and at another that it meant little. There was no contradiction between those statements. It might mean much or little. The Government tried to make the free-trade Unionists think that it meant little, but when appealing to the protectionists they made out that it meant a great deal. The House wanted to know where retaliation began and where it was to end. What trade was the Government going to select for their experiment? How were the words "outrageous unfairness" to be defined? Every Government had a right to protect its own industries as it pleased; therefore there was no "outrageous unfairness" on the part of Governments. Was it the result of cartels? But the promoters of the cartel system simply fined their own people for our advantage, so that the unfairness, if any, was to their people and not to us. A clearer definition and clearer thinking on this matter were desirable. Where was the scheme to be applied? It was true that the principal trade of Bradford was hard hit by the M'Kinley Tariff, but there were compensations. Up to that time Bradford had been a city of one trade—a disadvantageous circumstance to any town. Since that trade had diminished in prosperity other trades had grown up in its place, greatly to the advantage of Bradford, and one of them was of a most remarkable character, because the hon. Member for Central Bradford said it had been able to convert him from the raw material into the finished article. The Government said they wanted to extend the area of free trade, but they were going to proceed to do it in a strange manner. They appeared to be going to foreign countries to say, "If you do not become free-traders we will become protectionists." The action was akin to that of going to the Chinese and saying, "If you do not become Christians we will become Confucians." It was said that retaliation only meant commercial treaties. He should never forget hearing Mr. Gladstone, who knew more about these things than most people, saying that there were great disadvantages attaching to all commercial treaties, and he believed that that statesman abandoned a commercial treaty he was negotiating with France simply because it entailed a reversal of our free trade policy. The Government might expect to do great things by commercial treaties, but it should be remembered that the two greatest financiers and statesmen of the century, Peel and Gladstone, had the weapon of negotiation or retaliation in their hands, but they deliberately abandoned it because they believed it was of no advantage to this country, and where they failed he did not think the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was likely to succeed. The President of the Board of Trade had urged that the knowledge that the British market was open encouraged other countries to erect tariff walls against us. He believed it had the opposite effect. By flinging away our open markets we should throw away our best card. If we closed our markets there would be no more advantage to the foreigner in dealing with us than with any other nation. Our open markets had made us the best customer among the countries of the world, and those open markets secured better terms for our traders than the finesse of any statesman with the weapon of retaliation in his hand. The open-market policy, besides, encouraged other countries to establish friendly relations with us, to fear the loss of those relations, and to refrain from interference when we were engaged in extending our Empire. The British Empire could not have existed in its present state had it not been for our open markets, and if the Government erected tariff barriers jealousy against England would assume a dangerous shape in all other countries.

Finally, he wanted to know what was the attitude of the Government. Retaliation was on their lips, but protection was in their hearts. With one important exception Ministers had made protectionist speeches. The doctrine of plenary inspiration had received a new interpretation in Ministerial speeches, because Ministers, having apparently accepted the same doctrine of inspiration, had all spoken with differing voices. He wished to know which was the true voice. The Government were supported by those who made protectionist speeches, who had set their hearts on protection, and would be content with nothing less. They would be kept in office by protectionist votes, and he believed that the protectionists were sufficiently good bargainers not to give their votes for nothing. If their votes were given to the Government the protectionists would expect the Government to pursue a protectionist policy whether they liked it or not. The Colonial Secretary had said the Government would support those who honestly supported the Government policy. Great stress was laid on the word "honestly," and that raised a doubt in his mind, or rather it left him in no doubt. He did not believe that Unionist free-traders could "honestly" support the policy of the Government. It was the duty of every honest and convinced free-trader to vote for free trade now, when, for the first time, a clear and definite issue was presented to the House. It would be a different thing if it were a sincere and convinced free-trade Government that asked for this power of retaliation. He would be reluctant to do so, but in such a case he would agree. But this Government was tarred with the brush of protection. If the Prime Minister had, in September, spoken the words uttered the other day by the President of the Board of Trade, the free-trade members of the Cabinet would not have resigned. But they were allowed to retire, and the protectionists were exalted to great honour. The speech of the President of the Board of Trade seemed like a death-bed repentance; he did not believe in death-bed repentances; and as a free-trader he could not possibly give a vote of confidence in a Government which contained members expressing the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Colonial Secretary—in a Government of unsettled convictions and divergent opinions, that had played and dallied with a question of the greatest national importance, and that, in a great national crisis, had shown no power to guide or control. The Unionist Party was split into two sections because they had two leaders, one of whom had led too much and the other too little. The result was deplorable, but matters could not be mended by compromising with conscience, by crying "peace" when there was no peace, or by giving a cowardly and vacillating support to a policy which in their hearts they detested and condemned.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL (Aston Manor) said that references were continually being made to "the traditional policy" of the Conservative Party, and the free-fooders had claimed that they were following that policy. But as far back as 1891 the National Union of Conservative Associations unanimously passed resolutions in favour of—

> "The extension of commerce upon a preferential basis throughout all parts of the British Empire," and "expressing the earnest expectation that Her Majesty's Government will see their way clear before the next electoral campaign to make some decisive declaration of their intention to promote mutually favouring Customs arrangements between the Colonies and the mother country."

Therefore it was not the free-fooders, but the main body of the Party, the supporters of the Government at the present time, that were more nearly supporting the traditional policy of the Conservative Party. He was in favour of ideal free trade, but it was useless to talk about "the expansion of natural demand"—as free trade had been defined by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Berwick—when that expansion was forcibly restricted by the action of other nations. We had never had free trade, and he feared that it was as Utopian as universal citizenship or universal peace. There were aspects of our trade which pointed to the necessity of some fiscal change. Till lately Bridport in Dorsetshire had had a large trade to North Brittany in cotton fishing-nets made from cotton-twine. By the imposition about eight years ago of a 20 per cent. duty in France upon cotton-twine that trade had been destroyed. He knew of a pottery in the Midlands the owner of which had decided to transfer his works to Germany, as he would then be able to sell his goods in that country without paying import duties and still be able to bring his surplus stock to this country free. The result would be that a number of hands would be discharged in this country, and Germans employed in their places. Another case was that of a publisher who wished to reprint an American edition of his books. The cost of the printing in United States was £5,000 more than in this country, but, as it would cost £20,000 to import the books into the United States owing to the 25 per cent, duty on English books, the publisher had decided to have them printed in that country. Was not that a loss to British workers directly due to the hostile United States tariff? Tariff reformers desired to retain these trades for the benefit of our own people, for if the present policy continued they would certainly be sacrificed. Some alteration must be made. He did not approve of Lord Rosebery's "commercial repose." There was a danger of our being like the ostrich who put his head in the sand; we should awake to find some of our best feathers plucked, and very meagre, sorry objects we should then be. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Member for Croydon, speaking of German iron, imported into Great Britain, had said that we resold it as ships to Germany, so that dumping was really an advantage to us. But how long was that likely to go on? As soon as Germany had succeeded in squeezing out or killing the production of iron here she would put up her prices to suit her own trade. It could not be too strongly emphasised that tariff reform was desired not to assist one trade at the expense of the general taxpayer, in the old protective sense, but for the purpose of defence. There was all the difference in the world between putting up a shelter to preserve a plant which would naturally be hardy and which would only be made tender by being sheltered, and putting up a shelter to prevent its being blown down by a foreign hurricane. He was entirely opposed to bolstering up a particular industry for its express benefit, but it was a very different thing to defend our trade against the action of commercial rivals. Cheapness was not our only concern. It was no use being able to buy in the cheapest market if we had no market in which to sell our own goods to get money with which to buy. They had heard a great deal about cheapness. Cheap food was very desirable, but it should not be forgotten that regular employment was even more so. He was not committed to any precise tax on food; and he did not vote for the repeal of the registration duty on corn. He maintained that if a small duty such as that, or not very much greater, were maintained for the purpose of welding the Empire together, so long as its imposition did not increase the cost of living, it was a policy at which they ought all to aim; and he was very glad to gather that the Government would not be opposed to something of that kind.

They were told that the Tariff Commission was of very little use; but he did not agree with that view. It was most essential that they should not commit themselves to a definite policy until they had had a scientific inquiry; and he would not be prepared to say what tax should be put on this or that article until the matter had been carefully considered by experts. A Royal Commission was suggested; but he doubted whether very much would be gained by adopting that course. If such a Commission spent all its time arguing in the abstract between the merits of free trade, or protection, or self-defence they would not get very far. It was quite certain that as long as foreign countries were succeeding under a protectionist policy, while the trade of this country was remaining stationary or not advancing at the same rate, the people of this country would become more and more in favour of some tariff reform. He looked forward with the utmost confidence, in the long run, to a change from the present system; and he believed the Government would be authorised to make it by the vast majority of the electors. A great deal had been said about the difficulty of arranging Colonial preference, because this country would have to make bargains with the Colonies. He did not fear a bargain as much as some hon. Gentlemen did, who said that bargains were causes of quarrel, and that this country could not make a bargain with the Colonies without the risk of a quarrel. Ordinary business experience showed that bargains were, as a rule, for mutual advantage, and that they were more frequently sources of gain to both parties than sources of quarrel. He thought that that would be the result of colonial preference. He was glad the Colonial Secretary appealed to his hon. friends and also to hon. Gentlemen opposite not to close the door to colonial preference as probably it could be worked to the advantage of this country and also to the advantage of the Colonies, and would weld the Empire together. He had heard with the greatest satisfaction the proposal for the solidification of the Empire by trade exchanges between its units, and the extension, as far as possible, of the principle of a Zollverein. A commercial union, not less than a political union, was a valuable setting for the jewels of the British Crown, and he protested against perpetually smarting under the disadvantages of one-sided free trade and unfair foreign competition, such as were occasioned by free imports into this country when hostile tariff walls were erected against British goods in foreign countries. This present system under modern circumstances represented the forces of dogmatic pedantry and alleged political economy against those of practical business experience.

*SIR EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) said he desired to address the House from a point of view which had not been sufficiently considered up to the present—viz., the agricultural point of view. Looked at from that point of view the policy of the Government was simply a policy of taxing the agriculturist in every direction and, at the same time, not giving him any advantage at all. The President of the Board of Trade put forward the present official policy; of retaliation but they were told there was a much stronger policy behind it. He admitted that the policy of retaliation would not hurt the agriculturist as much as the other policy which lay behind it. That was the policy of the Prime Minister which, as far as it was possible to understand it, was the policy of the half-way house. The Prime Minister's policy was to impose taxes only on manufactured articles. The effect of that policy would be that every farmer, and every agricultural labourer, would have to pay more for everything be had to buy; the tendency would be that wages would fall; and the actual result would be that the farmers would be crippled and the labourers would be crippled. That would be a bad thing for those who had to live on the land and by the land. He was confirmed in that view by what had been said at the Central Chamber of Agriculture by a well-know Agriculturist, Mr. Rider Haggard, who said that the policy of the Prime Minister would nearly approach ruin, and appealed to the farmers to resist it to the last. That was the opinion of a gentleman who was a Conservative and whose opinion in the matter would be treated with respect by agriculturists. Mr. Haggard also said that it was all very well for the leaders of his Party to say, "Jump into the fiscal river and when you are beginning to sink, Mr. Balfour in a boat will be ready to pull you out. He did not believe in Mr. Balfour's boat, it might be wanted when it was not there. There was no half-way house on the steep road which ran from free trade to protection, they must have one or the other." He himself thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Sleaford Division was very well advised when, the other day, he did not venture to refer to what the effect the Prime Minister's policy would be on agriculturists. A stranger in the House would, with the exception of two or three sentences, have thought from his speech that the right hon. Gentleman was a great manufacturer and not a great agriculturist, as the whole tenor of his speech was what the policy would do for the manufacturers. The right hon. Gentleman was the leader of the agriculturists; but he did not say a word as to how the policy of the Prime Minister would affect them, because he knew that that policy meant certain ruin for farmers. The right hon. Gentleman also supported the policy of the ex-Colonial Secretary. He himself was willing to admit that on the face of it that policy appeared to be to the advantage of the agriculturist. That was the policy of the "whole hogger," which would put taxes on all round. He had looked in to that scheme to see what advantage it would be to agriculturists, and although he would be prepared to make sacrifices himself and would not add to the cost of the living of the working classes of this country for his own benefit. He must give his advice to his Agricultural friends upon its merit, and not upon sentiment alone.

Examining the scheme he found that it was essentially a manufacturers and Colonial one for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham stated in the most frank way that this country was not an agricultural country and never would be, and that the main source of the prosperity of the country was its great manufactures. The essence of the right hon. Gentleman's scheme was to pretend to benefit agriculturists and throw dust in their eyes and persuade them that they would be better off under protection. The tax the right hon. Gentleman proposed on agricultural produce was 5 per cent. only as compared with 10 per cent. on manufactured articles and a 2s. duty a quarter on wheat. Mr. Martin Sutton, a great authority on this question, declared in a letter to The Times that a 2s. duty on wheat would not be the slightest advantage to the farmers, and that a 10s. duty was the smallest duty that would be of any use to them. As regarded the 5 per cent. duty on dairy produce and meat, it should be remembered that at the present moment there was enormous competition from the Colonies and the essence of the right hon. Gentleman's scheme was to stimulate further competition from the Colonies. The object of the tax on dairy produce and meat was not to help the agricultural interest in this country, but to help Canada and Australia by stimulating the production of meat, butter, and cheese, in those countries. As regarded meat, it should be remembered that half the meat now imported was colonial; and therefore, the English agriculturists would not get the benefit of the 5 per cent. duty, but would only get the benefit of half of it. The west of England knew already what colonial competition was. In Somersetshire the Cheddar cheese industry had suffered severely by the importation of Canadian cheese and in many places it had quite destroyed the making of cheese. As regarded dairy produce, the result of the tax would be to further stimulate colonial competition as well as to increase the price of feeding stuffs which were imported from foreign countries. They might be told they could use maize instead, on which no tax was to be put. Maize might be very valuable, but it could not be used entirely by itself. It was not, moreover, of such value as oilcake or cotton-cake upon which 10 per cent duty would be imposed. Then it was said that the farmers would have plenty of corn offals; and that, owing to the duty on flour. The farmer had, however, some experience already on that point. When the duty of 5d. cwt. on flour was put on, it was said it would be an immense advantage to the farmers; but it turned out, as was stated by himself at the time, that offals were exported to the very countries which were competing with the British farmer in dairy produce. The offals were exported because the freight abroad was cheaper than railway rates at home, and the drawback of 2s. 6d. a ton on offals exported was also an important stimulus. Under the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the exporters of offals would get a bounty of 5s. a ton, and the inducement to export offals abroad doubled. The Prime Minister confirmed that view, as, speaking on the removal of the corn tax, he said—

> "He was by no means certain that the extra quantity of wheat offals milled in this country went to the farmer, as the drawback offered an extra inducement to millers to export them to the rivals of farmers on the Continent. He was convinced, he said, that fiscally it was a good tax, but the farmers had more cause to complain of it than any other class."

The truth was that it was much easier to export offals than consign them to distant counties at home owing to the heavy rates charged by the railway companies. He ventured to say that the Government would be doing more good to the agriculturists if, instead of putting a 2s. tax on wheat, to give preference to the colonial farmer, they were to forbid the railway companies giving preferential rates to foreign goods. The late Mr. Hanbury urged on the Board of Trade to prevent the present state of things under which bacon, butter and cheese from abroad was taken from Southampton to London for 6s. a ton, whereas the same British produce was charged 17s. 11d. per ton. The farmers should insist the Government should provide that foreign goods should be charged same rates as English goods, and that the English goods should be carried at the same rates as foreign goods. Mr. Chamberlain's scheme by its tax on feeding stuffs would destroy the milk trade which was none too prosperous by increasing the cost of the production of milk.

They were being told of the good old days of protection. They might have been good old days, but only for a very limited class indeed. The farmers suffered very much in the early part of the century. Evidence was given before Select Committees of this House in 1821 and 1833. Before the former, a large farmer in Somerset said he sold wheat at 64s. a quarter, paid his men 8s. a week wages, and considered that the right price for wheat was 10s. a bushel. In 1833 when wheat was 52s. 11d. a quarter, nearly double what it was at present, another Somersetshire farmer complained that if wheat fell to 50s. a quarter poor land would go out of cultivation altogether. He added that his labourers who were paid 8s. a week were better off than he was. Agriculture must have been in a very bad state at that period when a farmer told a Committee of this House that his labourers receiving 8s. a week were better off than he was. If the extreme protectionists had their way, as no doubt they would if the Government continued on the slide they were on, agriculture would be in as bad a state as it was before the repeal of the Corn Laws. The farmers and the labourers would suffer and the landlords would get very little advantage as shown by evidence given before the Select Committees he had referred to, that land was unlet and rents falling owing to tenants having lost their capital though price of wheat, was double or treble what it now was. As an agriculturist he, therefore, most strongly supported the Amendment of his right hon. friend.

ADDRESS.

The King's Answer to the Address of Tuesday the 2nd instant reported; and Address and Answer to be printed and published.

WEI-HAI-WEI—AN UNFOUNDED RUMOUR.

EARL SPENCER: I am not sure whether the noble Marquess has any further information to communicate with reference to the answer he was good enough to give to me the other day about Wei-hai-Wei.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): A telegram was sent from the Admiralty with reference to the story of Wei-hai-Wei being used as a base of attack upon Port Arthur by the Japanese fleet. It was dated 12th February and was as follows—

"Admiralty to Commander-in-Chief, China Station. Rumour current in St. Petersburg causing great exasperation that Wei-hai-Wei, with Great Britain's connivance, was used by Japanese as a base for attack on Port Arthur. Important that His Majesty's Government should be in a position to give absolute contradiction. Report without delay."

The Admiralty has now received the following answer—

"Hong-kong, February 12, 1904. Rumour absolutely without foundation. Wei-hai-Wei did not even know operations were proceeding until I telegraphed fight. First intimation of operations came through Chefoo from steamer calling there from Port Arthur. Wei-hai-Wei's first direct knowledge of belligerent proceedings was the visit of steamer "Fuping" to report circumstances of her being fired on. Air out here is full of baseless rumour obviously deliberately concocted."

The "Fuping," as the noble Earl will remember, is the steamer which was fired at as she was leaving Port Arthur.

AFFAIRS OF SOUTH-EASTERN EUROPE—CONDITION OF MACEDONIA.

*LORD NEWTON, who had given notice "To call attention to the correspondence recently presented to Parliament respecting the affairs of South-Eastern Europe and to move for further Papers," said: My Lords, just about a year ago I called attention to the threatening aspect of affairs in Macedonia, and the Foreign Secretary, in his reply, made what I think was the fullest statement that has yet been made with regard to British policy in that part of the world, and the most important statement which was elicited from him was that His Majesty's Government had determined, in conjunction with the other signatory Powers to the Treaty of Berlin, to leave the decision of the question to the Austrian and Russian Governments. A year has passed since then, and I do not think it is any exaggeration to say that the state of Macedonia and of European Turkey generally has gone steadily from bad to worse. Since the date of the reform scheme which was put forward by the Austrian and Russian Governments and accepted by the Porte, twelve months have elapsed. During that period many thousands of persons have lost their lives, some in fair fighting, others in the course of massacre; many hundreds of villages have been destroyed, and many thousands of refugees are now existing in a miserable state both inside and outside of the provinces in question.

Upon whom does the responsibility for this state of things lie? The majority of persons in this country have no difficulty whatever in determining upon whom the responsibility rests. The majority of persons in this country place the whole responsibility upon the Turkish Government, but I cannot help pointing out that in many instances there appears to be a somewhat erroneous conception of the situation. It is generally assumed—more especially in ecclesiastical circles—that the present condition of affairs in Macedonia is due to the general persecution of the Christian inhabitants by the Mussulmans. It has been already pointed out more than once, but perhaps it is worth while pointing it out again, that that is not an exact definition of the present state of things. The present state of things arises directly from the determination of the Bulgarian inhabitants of Macedonia to free themselves from Turkish rule, and I do not know that they can be much blamed for that determination. I would observe to your Lordships that this contention of mine is amply justified by the fact that the insurrection which is maintained by the Bulgarian inhabitants of Macedonia, receives not only no support from the Greeks and the other Christians in the provinces, but is actively opposed by them.

To return to the question of responsibility. I admit to the full the responsibility of the Turkish Government; but that responsibility must be shared by the irreconcilable section of the Macedonian insurgents; it must be shared also, in a more modified degree, by the Bulgarian Government, and, lastly, I regret to say it must be shared to some extent by the Austrian and Russian Governments, which have undertaken, with complete unsuccess, the pacification of the country. Dealing first of all with the responsibility of Turkey, no one can deny that the Turkish Government is the original culprit in the matter. No one in their senses would attempt to defend the massacres and the outrages that have been perpetrated by the Turkish troops, and no one will deny, or attempt to deny, the continual obstruction of the Turkish Government to all proposed reforms—an obstruction which is due to the innate stupidity of the Ottoman Government. But, at the same time, with the best will in the world, supposing that the Turkish Government had really been anxious to carry out the reforms which have now been pressed upon them, I for my part am unable to see how they could have succeeded. During the last year—you may say far more than that—there has been a permanent insurrection going on in the country. The position of the Turks is very much like to a man whose house is on fire and who is surrounded by his friends who order him to put out the fire according to their instructions, but in his endeavours to put it out, he finds that it is continually being set ablaze in other parts. The fact is, the Turkish Government is totally unable to put an end to the insurrection, and the insurrection in itself is sufficient to prevent the introduction of any reforms. I say that the Turkish Government, so far, has shown itself absolutely incapable of putting down the insurrection, and, as a proof of the almost complete demoralisation of the Turkish Administration, I am credibly informed that the insurgents draw the greater quantity of their military supplies through Turkey and by means of the Turkish officials and the Turkish officers.

But there is another point which, I think, must have forced itself upon everyone who has taken the trouble to read the last two Blue-books. I maintain that it is as plain as possible, and I maintained so last year, that the revolutionary committees have not the slightest intention of allowing the reforms to be introduced. The object of the revolutionary committees or their leaders, or, at all events, the object of some of the leaders, has been to render the introduction of reforms impossible; and, what is much worse, they have in some instances, I regret to say in many instances, deliberately endeavoured, by the commission of crimes themselves, to goad the Turks into perpetrating atrocities on a large scale. If anybody doubts the truth of this assertion I need only refer him to the despatches from the Consuls who so ably represent us in that part of the world. The Blue-books teem with evidence of the crimes of some of these revolutionary bands and of their methods, and I repeat that this information does not come from the Turkish Government, but is supplied by independent witnesses such as the Greeks and His Majesty's Consuls. I should like to quote one single instance. In June last year I observe that the Greek Minister in London handed to the noble Marquess a list of between 100 and 200 Greeks who had been deliberately murdered, apparently in cold blood, by the Bulgarian insurgents in pursuance of their irreconcilable programme. These men have not only murdered inoffensive men, and women too, in cold blood, but they have burnt villages and blown up railways and banks, and one of their most notorious leaders announced in the summer of last year that if the committees were suppressed he would take measures for the assassination of the English, the French, or the German Consul in Salonika.

The Prime Minister was not long ago much found fault with for his version of the balance of criminality. I admit at once that, if it is a question of quantity the balance of criminality is decidedly in favour of the Turks. They have undoubtedly burnt more villages, massacred more people, and committed atrocities on a much larger scale than their opponents. But what I should like to point out is this, that the work of the irreconcilable insurgents has been of precisely the same character as that of the Turkish troops, although not upon the same scale, and if it comes to a question of quality and of character I am not at all sure that the crimes perpetrated by the insurgents are not the worst of the two. Although the crimes committed by the Turkish troops are outrageous in their nature, yet they are crimes which are perpetrated by men who in many instances are little better than semi-barbarians, and who have been goaded by extreme provocation; on the other hand, the deliberate crimes of the Bulgarian insurgents, under some of their leaders, have been committed by Christian and highly educated men.

With regard to the responsibility of the Bulgarian Government, which I said was a lesser form of responsibility, I think that the position of that Government is well defined by Mr. Elliot, who wrote in the summer of last year that the limits of the Bulgarian Government are prescribed by the amount of repression which the country will stand. If I diagnose the Blue-book correctly, the country will not stand any repression at all. At all events, the Bulgarian Government has never made any very serious effort to cope with the difficulty. It cannot be denied that the bands are formed there and start from Bulgaria; that they retreat there when they are too severely pressed; that they are in many cases officered by officers of the Bulgarian Army; and that they are frequently armed with rifles taken from the Government stores. There is an active and flourishing manufacture of bombs carried on in the country, and when the insurgent chiefs return to Bulgaria they meet with triumphant receptions. But the Bulgarian Government supplies the one humorous touch in this gloomy tragedy. Towards the end of October, when the prospects as to peace were slightly better, it was proposed that troops on both sides should be disbanded, and Mr. Elliot explained that the Bulgarian Government would be glad to send as many men home as possible in order that they might take part in the general election. I am not surprised at this desire of the Bulgarian Government, because I once happened to be in Bulgaria whilst a general election was going on, and I remember observing that every voter as he approached the ballot was taken charge of by a soldier, who took care that he voted the right way. I imagine that older Governments must wish that they had similar means at their disposal in order to secure a majority when a general election occurs.

I now pass from the responsibility of Turkey, of the insurgents, and of the Bulgarian Government, to the responsibility of the Austrian and Russian Governments. As far back as February, 1902, it had begun to dawn even upon these two Governments that the situation in Macedonia was threatening, and in that month, to use their own affected language, the two Governments were having a "loyal exchange of views." For a whole year they continued to loyally exchange views with no result; but in 1903, owing in great measure to the efforts made by the noble Marquess, they succeeded in producing a feeble scheme of reform which was accepted by the noble Marquess and by the other signatory Powers to the Treaty of Berlin, the noble Marquess being judicious enough to accept it in principle and to reserve to himself the right of making further suggestions that he might think necessary. This scheme was not happy in its start. It dealt largely with the question of the gendarmerie, and amongst other things recommended a general amnesty. A general amnesty took place; but what was the result? A good many thousand prisoners were released, and, as the Consuls pointed out would be the case before it happened, they all immediately went off and joined the insurgent bands. Another recommendation was that a certain proportion of the gendarmerie should be Christians, but I gather from a despatch from one of the Consuls that each one of these Christian gendarmes required a special bodyguard to protect him in doing his duty. Fighting was going on all the time. I will quote a passage from the Blue-book showing the view with which the Austrian Government treated the threatening danger. In the summer of last year Count Goluchowski, the Austrian Foreign Secretary, was asked by our Ambassador how things were going on, and he replied that he hoped that things there would turn out less bad than they generally expected, and the foundation for this optisism was that he had received very few telegrams lately from Macedonia.

Owing to the pressure exercised by the noble Marquess—and I will say this for the noble Marquess, that he and Sir N. O'Conor, our Ambassador at Constantinople, appear to be the only two persons who throughout this business have shown any sense of the gravity of the situation—towards the end of October the Austrian and Russian Governments put their heads together and came out with a new scheme, which is known as the Murzsteg scheme. I will not go into the details of this scheme, but it was submitted to the noble Marquess, and he approved of it generally, making the same reservation that he had made with regard to the former scheme, and adding the somewhat obvious observation that there was no provision in the scheme for the payment of anybody in connection with it. In order to show the dilatory procedure of the Austrian and Russian Governments, I should like to point out that on 4th November this scheme was presented to the Porte and flatly refused. Thereupon His Majesty's Government were naturally rather perturbed, and again applied to Count Goluchowski. Count Goluchowski, declining absolutely to be hurried, said increased pressure must be exercised on the Porte, but first of all careful examination of the answer must be made. On 9th November, the Russian and Austrian Governments sent a Note saying that they were—to use their own language—"painfully embarrassed" by the reply they received. People who receive a flat refusal generally are painfully embarrassed. On 24th November, the Porte consented to accept the reforms in principle, but reserved the right of opposing them in detail.

On 30th November, a step further was taken. The two Governments actually agreed upon two assessors, but I should like to call attention to a notable fact with regard to them. I observe that the Austrian assessor was apparently selected on account of his knowledge of Russian, not the language which one would imagine to be the most useful in the circumstances. The assessors were agreed upon, but both Governments considered that it was inadvisable to send out any foreign officers as yet—this beingone of the suggestions made by the noble Marquess. On 4th December the Russian Government also deprecated sending any European officers out, as being a course likely to arouse the susceptibilities of the Sultan. On 5th December the two Governments, as if they had not already wasted sufficient time, actually proposed to leave the selection of the officer, who was to reorganise the gendarmerie,to the Porte. On 12th December the Austrian Government were still uncertain as to the nature of the European officers who were to be employed. On 9th December Sir N. O'Conor called the attention of the Russian Ambassador in Constantinople to the necessity of doing something, and Sir N. O'Conor says that the Russian Ambassador appeared to think that there was something to be said for it. On 15th December Sir N. O'Conor wrote home, and I think a quotation from this despatch really places the whole difficulty in a nutshell. He wrote—

> "Every week's delay makes the chances of the reforms pacifying the country less and the probability of a fresh outbreak in the spring greater. Should the preliminary negotiations even proceed a good deal faster than hitherto, the General can hardly arrive much before the end of the year, nor is it probable that the foreign officers who are to be attached to him will have all arrived even by that date. Probably January will be well advanced before any scheme of reorganisation is prepared and ready for adoption. By that time the spring will be at hand with its attendant dangers."

A few days after that the noble Marquess himself lost a certain amount of his inexhaustible patience and wrote—

> "It cannot be said that even the initial steps towards putting it into practical effect have been accomplished."

As I have already remarked, the noble Marquess and Sir N. O'Conor are really the only people throughout this business who seem to have taken any real interest in it, and who have made any suggestions. I daresay the noble Marquess will tell me that a certain amount has been done since the Blue-book closed. The Blue-book practically closes with the despatch which I have just read. I do not exactly know what the position is now, but the position after about six months of the first programme had gone by was this, that there was nothing to show for it except the presence of the Inspector-General Hilmi Pasha, and two Swedish offiicers, neither of whom could speak Turkish or had anything to do.

It is true that some progress has been made. Since the Blue-book closed, an Italian general has been selected to reorganise the gendarmerie, and has arrived, I understand, at Constantinople. The two assessors are, I believe, at Salonika, where they are working under the superintendence of Hilmi Pasha, who shows no desire to encourage their journey into the interior of the country. What I think this Blue-book does show is that the Austrian and Russian Governments have proved themselves quite incapable of dealing with the situation, and I do not think myself, although the noble Marquess may not admit that I am right, that the reason is very difficult to find. These two Powers—Austria and Russia—who have been called in as physicians to minister to the disease of the sick man, also consider themselves to be his heirs and I have no doubt each of them considers himself entitled to the position of residuary legatee. It is clear to me that these two Governments have been just as much occupied in watching each other as they have been in superintending and introducing reforms. What I want to point out is that time is everything in this business. All the indications point to an outbreak before long. I myself contemplated a visit to that part of the world, and I have been making inquiries on my own account and am told that anybody who thinks about going out there had better lose no time because the end of March is about the latest period on which one can count upon even the present conditions being maintained. Owing to the absurd and dilatory tactics of these twoGovernments, who have done little else but play—involuntarily, no doubt—into the hands of the Sultan and the Porte, precious time has been lost.

There remain about six weeks in which to put matters right. As I said a moment ago, an outbreak generally seems to be anticipated about the end of March; but it is not merely an outbreak of insurrection which is anticipated, but a war between Turkey and Bulgaria. That war appeared imminent a year ago, but it looks very much more imminent now, and, unless I entirely misread the signs, both sides are eager for a fight. The Bulgarians are more prepared than they were this time last year. They have got an excellent Army, which man for man, is probably much superior to the Turkish Army; and, on the other hand, the Turks feel no doubt that the situation has gone on long enough and that if they can go to war and defeat the Bulgarians they will at all events secure a certain amount of peace. In view of the gravity of the situation—a gravity which I do not think can well be exaggerated—I appeal to the noble Marquess whether the time has not come when he should produce the alternative which he alluded to, not only in his despatch, but in the speech which he made on the Address. The noble Marquess made use of these significant words in the speech which he delivered on the Address—

> "If these schemes should fail to produce the desired result, we reserve to ourselves entire liberty to take into consideration and to propose alternative and more far-reaching measures."

Well, my Lords, I do not know whether the noble Marquess considers that the time for making suggestions and proposals has arrived. I have no idea what his reply will be to me on this point. But, at all events, if he does not consider that the time is yet ripe for these alternative proposals, I presume he will have no objection to making a statement, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, that all the forces of our diplomacy will be exercised for the purpose of localising this war if it should break out, and of limiting it to the two countries which are directly concerned.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty for further Papers respecting the affairs of South-Eastern Europe."—(Lord Newton.)

THE EARL OF LYTTON: My Lords, in spite of the extremely humorous description which the noble Lord has given of the situation, I think everyone will agree that its gravity is quite sufficient to justify a general discussion on the matter in your Lordships' House. The present moment is a very critical one, because everyone feels that time is getting on and that before very long the moment will have arrived when the labours of the reformers who are working at this moment to bring about a peaceable settlement of this Eastern question will necessarily be brought to an end. It it obvious that all discussions in Parliament upon matters of foreign affairs are necessarily handicapped to a certain extent by a feeling of constraint and the knowledge of the necessity of carefully choosing words which will not be misinterpreted in the far regions to which they will be immediately telegraphed. It is obvious that the Minister in charge of our foreign affairs cannot make a speech on matters of foreign policy in Parliament without very great attention being paid to everything he says, and without in some cases his words being received with a certain disposition to misunderstand them. At any rate, he cannot take part in such discussions as if they were matters of ordinary debate. Therefore, though I join with my noble friend in desiring to urge upon the noble Marquess that he should give us some more reassuring evidence than has yet been put before the public with regard to a settlement of this question, I disclaim any intention whatever of wishing to embarrass his position or to complicate the difficulties with which he is now necessarily confronted.

I agree that the noble Marquess has shown himself throughout these negotiations to be the Minister most in earnest in seeking for reform—a matter for which we owe him a great debt of gratitude. I only intervene, therefore, to state the effect which the Blue-book has had upon myself. I feel very little interest in any attempts to work out the balance of criminality, or to settle the precise degree of responsibility for what has taken place in the past. My interest is not in the past. These outrages and acts of violence which have taken place are matters which we all regret, but my anxiety is rather for the future and what is going to take place. I leave out, therefore, any attempt to try and lodge the responsibility for what has taken place upon any particular shoulders, but I feel that no one can read these Blue-books without feeling that three facts stand out very markedly from them. The first is the failure of the present system of dual control, which has been left exclusively in the hands of Austria and Russia—the failure, that is, on their part to restore peace in the troublous area or to produce reforms which are received with any degree of satisfaction. The second fact is the certainty that, in a very few weeks, the insurrection will break out again, with the extreme imminence of war between Bulgaria and Turkey. And the third fact is that Great Britain is really the Power to whom all concerned look with the greatest amount of confidence, and the Power which appears to have the power to control the course of events. Putting these three facts together, it follows that a very considerable responsibility rests upon the shoulders of His Majesty's Government; and it is unnecessary to prove that, if they have it in their power to prevent a renewal of these acts of violence of which the Balkan Peninsula has been the scene so recently, and which are an insult and an affront to the whole civilised world, and to prevent an outbreak of war between Turkey and Bulgaria, and secure both these ends, they will have gained the gratitude, not only of everybody in this country, but of all the nations in Europe. The point, therefore, of the utmost importance at this moment is whether these two objects can be accomplished.

The noble Earl the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs has laid down two conditions as necessary for any permanent settlement of this question. The first is, that Turkey should realise that her administration in practice, whatever it might be in theory, is utterly unsatisfactory; that it is a gross violation of all her treaty obligations, and a menace, not only to the security of her own rule, but to the peace of neighbouring States. The second is that the law-abiding population in that part of the world must be made to understand both the ability and determination of the European Powers to safeguard them against any misgovernment in the future. These are two conditions which may be accepted, so far as they go, as satisfactory by all who are interested in the matter; but the point which follows is, what has been done to satisfy, in any way, these conditions? So far as the Blue-book goes I venture to say that it leaves one on the last page with the idea that nothing has been done to satisfy either of these two conditions. A year has passed by since the mandate was given to the two Powers in question to carry out the resettlement of this part of the world. It was not until 25th November that they produced, and got the Porte to accept, any scheme of reform which would make matters the least bit better—that scheme, by the way, was put forward in the first instance by the noble Marquess himself—and the Blue-book ends on 28th December without any advance having been made whatever. The Porte merely gave a qualifying acceptance of those proposals of reform—accepted them, that is to say, in principle—and from that moment to the present, so far as we are aware, nothing whatever has been done in order to get them effectively carried out.

We have always been told that matters have been left to these two countries, because they are most interested in that situation. That, I think, no one could question; but is it not a fact that the mere interest which these two Powers have in that part of the world necessarily prevents them from being as active as one could wish in the cause of reform? My noble friend has said that they are like residuary legatees. If I might pursue that simile, I should say that they are like two trustees who have been left in charge of a ward whose fortune, at his death, would go to them—that is to say, that a man, in leaving his fortune to his successor, and after him to two other persons, had left those two other persons as trustees of the ward during his lifetime. In that case, would not the law have laid down that the mere interest which these two had in the death of that particular person did not make them qualified to be trustees in that situation? It seems to me that these two Powers are exactly in that position, and the very fact of their great interest in that part of the world makes their policy mistrusted rather than trusted. Well, they have at least produced a reform scheme which passes anything that has been proposed up to the present moment, but even that scheme has its short-comings. I should like to get to-day some further information from the noble Marquess with regard to the scheme—some information that will carry us further than the Blue-books which up to the present have been published—and some assurances as to the means which will be set on foot to get it carried out.

There are, in my opinion, several defects in the scheme. The first is that the Inspector-General, who is to have charge of the administration of the country for the next two years, is himself a Turk, and still subject to the control of the Sultan himself, and the policy which he pursues in the meantime will be a determining factor in his future career. Is it to be hoped that a man in that position, directly connected with the Government of Turkey, can act as independently as an administrator in those circumstances is bound to do? Then, too, the Inspector-General is a man who, so far as I can gather, is not likely to inspire great confidence in the minds of those who are creating disturbances in this part of the world. He has, to a large extent, already forfeited their confidence, and that I consider to be a very vital defect in this scheme of reform. Then there is the further point that the Turkish governors of the three provinces are left entirely independent of him. As your Lordships are probably aware, it is the practice in Turkey for every official to receive his orders direct from the Sultan, and they are enabled in many cases to override those who are placed over them. Therefore, I have very grave doubts whether, with the best will in the world, this Inspector-General can carry out a very effective administration of the country. Two assessors responsible to the Powers have been placed under him to advise and to watch his actions, but the powers of those two assessors are at present entirely indefinite. That is a matter upon which I hope we may possibly get a little more information, because it seems to me there is great likelihood that they will be referred to in order to justify anything that may happen and in order to share the responsibility of the Inspector-General, without having any power to get their wishes enforced.

Then, with regard to the gendarmerie—the reorganisation of which is satisfactory so far as it goes—what I should like to know is whether, when the reorganisation of the gendarmerie has taken place, the European officers who have been introduced in order to carry out that reorganisation, will be placed in positions of command, and whether they will be assisted in any way in re-establishing order in the country. I should also like to know how many officers it is proposed should be sent by European Powers to help the gendarmerie to carry out their work. At present, so far as I can make out, there is only one officer sent by the Powers, and, no doubt, while these officers might be useful in reporting what is going on, it cannot be shown that they will be in any way an effective force in re-establishing order. Then there is another point which has not yet been referred to, namely, the exclusion of the vilayet of Adrianople from the scheme of reforms. Here is a case in which not even an attempt at reform has been made. That part of the country has been left altogether out of consideration. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs imagines that so successful will be the reforms in the other parts of the Sultan's dominions that the Sultan himself, seeing how satisfactory they are, will be induced to include the part left out in the reorganisation. I cannot help thinking that that is a very sanguine view to take. I have not such confidence in this scheme of reform as laid down at present, to imagine that when it is carried out the Sultan will be so filled with admiration at the result that he will propose to extend it. I regard the exclusion of the vilayet of Adrianople as a serious defect in the scheme. So far as I can make out, no general amnesty is included. I see that in this case it has been replaced by a mixed Commission, both of Christian and Mahomedans, to try those brought before them for political offences. I cannot help thinking that this mixed tribunal of Christians and Mahomedans is not likely to have the same effect which the promise of an amnesty would have; that the absence of this promise is a defect in this particular scheme of reform, and that the scheme will fail altogether to inspire that spirit of confidence which the noble Earl said is so essential to the re-establishment of order.

The noble Marquess the Foreign Minister throughout these negotiations has repeatedly reserved to himself the right to propose more important and more far-reaching measures of reform when the moment should arise, and in view of the very critical situation in which we find ourselves I should like to ask him whether that moment has not now arrived. There are two circumstances which do not lead us to have great confidence in the future, which will necessitate still more delays, and will prevent the two Powers in charge from improving the methods which they have adopted in the past. First of all, there is the outbreak of war in the Far East, which must necessarily, to a very large extent, absorb the interest and attention of Russian Ministers; and, secondly, there is the fact that Austria herself is now occupied with internal affairs of very great importance. The Austrian Government has been met by opposition on the part of the Hungarians to her army policy, the result of which is that the Hungarian Parliament has refused to vote the necessary money for the raising of new recruits. No less than five military riots have already taken place, and the Austrian Government is very much occupied in this matter. Both of the two Powers concerned, in whose charge the affairs of Macedonia have been left, are more occupied at this moment with other affairs than before, and it is not likely that the future will bring any greater precipitancy on their part or will find them more active than they have been in the past; in fact, there is really little doubt that nothing short of a complete change of policy and the adoption of the proposal which the noble Marquess himself made in September last year will bring about a peaceful solution.

I cannot help feeling some regret that the opinion expressed in the noble Marquess's despatch of 29th September, was not expressed more strongly. But no doubt there were reasons for trying other methods in the first instance. If the noble Marquess is unable to concur in the view that it is necessary now to put forward that alternative scheme, I trust he will give us some reassurance as to the methods which will be employed to carry out the scheme of reforms which has been accepted. The opportunity at this moment is a favourable one for pressing still further the claims of this country in the Near East. There is the fact that these two Powers are occupied with other matters; there is, further, the act that this country is regarded with a greater degree of confidence than any other Power by the persons concerned in Macedonia. There have been petitions from the Mahomedans themselves memorialising the British Government to interfere, and reputed petitions have been sent in on the part of the insurgents to His Majesty's Government to the same effect. Then there is the feeling of Turkey herself. Turkey, who in this, as in other matters, remains about fifty years behind the times, still believes that Great Britain is a traditional supporter of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and has, owing to that feeling, great confidence in the British Government; and all the other independent States in that peninsula are beginning to look to Great Britain, as it were, as the defender of their national sentiments. In other words, all the parties concerned do look towards Great Britain with a considerable amount of confidence, and the mere fact that we are not interested in the same sense as the other two Powers gives to the British Government enormous authority on this question.

Many have urged, on the other hand, that the British Government has no interest in interfering in this matter, but I would remind your Lordships that it is a tradition of our Foreign Ministers, and has been ever since the Conference of Berlin, that Great Britain has great interests in the Near East—interests which she must, at all costs, support. It is true that the policy which was adopted by this country at that date has very considerably changed, just in the same sense that the policy of Russia has changed. In the days of the Treaty of Berlin, the policy upheld in this country was one of supporting the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, which was opposed to the Russian policy of setting up independent States in which Russia could exercise certain control. But from the day that Bulgaria freed herself from this Russian influence, and showed that an independent Power had been established with a considerable amount of influence, from the days, that is, when Northern and Southern Bulgaria were united and became a strong and independent Power, the policy of these two countries changed. The policy of Russia is merely one of keeping affairs simmering, or still posing as protector to these Slav nationalities, while encouraging the seditions and insurrections which go on in that part of the world. At the same time the policy of this country has, ever since that day, been to maintain the independence of these Powers as far as possible. It was the policy which the late Prime Minister (the Marquess of Salisbury) endeavoured as far as possible to carry out in regard to Armenia. Lord Salisbury, at the time that the Armenian difficulty was at its height, did his best to promote the consolidation of Armenia. He was opposed in that policy by Russia, and was obliged to give way on account of the opposition which was placed in the way by the other Powers. But, although the policy of this country and of Russia has changed since the days of the Berlin Treaty, I do not know why our interests should be less or our methods of protecting them less effective. At that time our interests were put forward and maintained by every effective means, and I would urge that, in so far as we have interests now, they should be put forward and backed up by means no less effective. Therefore, as I have said, I hope we shall get some reassurance that, as regards the present scheme of reforms, at any rate, all the influence of this country will be brought to bear to see that they are most effectively carried out. I would only remind your Lordships once more that the time in which anything can be done is getting very short. The daylight of temporary peace which has been enjoyed in that part of Europe is rapidly drawing to a close, and the night-time of war, bloodshed, and massacre, is rapidly approaching—a time at which all work of reform will necessarily be brought to an end.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, I think the House will feel that the noble Lord opposite has done good service in bringing forward this matter, and he has brought to bear his diplomatic experience in an effective manner in dealing with it. I am sure that the attendance in your Lordships House this afternoon does not adequately represent the feeling in the country regarding the importance and gravity of this subject. I do not pretend that as yet there is a very widespread and vigorous sentiment awakened in the country, but I feel that if there was in regard to Macedonia one-half or one-quarter of the trouble taken and the money spent through the Press and otherwise, in imparting information as there was with regard to affairs in South Africa four years ago, there would have been a very strong feeling indeed created throughout the country. As your Lordships will remember, the agitation which went on in South Africa at that time, nominally in the interests of those who were subjected to grievances, real or imaginary, was supposed to be, not merely on behalf of British subjects, but of all the persons in that region who were affected; in fact, we were told that steps should be taken for the relief of the oppressed. There can be no question about the oppression in the case of the Balkan Peninsula, and, though I am fully in accord with the main drift of my noble friend's statement, I cannot see altogether eye to eye with him in regard to some of his contentions. The noble Lord said that there was an erroneous conception, and added that it had obtained more especially in ecclesiastical circles. Well, I do not know that the impression he referred to is altogether confined to ecclesiastical circles—the impression, that is, that the responsibility in regard to this deplorable state of things primarily or principally rests upon the Turks.

LORD NEWTON: I said "not solely."

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: The noble Lord says it is not correct to refer to the Mussulman persecutions as being solely responsible for the trouble. He also said that the insurgents received no encouragement from a large portion of the population, but I have not understood that these people have, on that account, been exempt from outrage and disabilities at the hands of the Turkish authorities. The noble Earl who spoke second in the debate said it was not of much interest to him to discuss the question of the balance of criminality; but, surely, that is not a mere academic question. We want to strengthen the hands of the noble Marquess in whatever action he may take on behalf of His Majesty's Government in pressing for reforms. You cannot put pressure on insurgents; you can only put pressure on a Government, and the Government you have to deal with is the Turkish Government. The House will fully agree that the manner in which the so-called negotiations and measures of reform have been conducted by the Russian and the Austrian Governments leaves much to be regretted.

With regard to the simile that has been used, I am reminded of the incident of a sick man who said to a visitor as he entered the sick room, "Did you meet the doctors in the hall? They have just gone." "Oh, yes," he said. "What was their opinion of my case?" inquired the invalid. "Well," replied the visitor, perhaps too candidly, "they cannot agree about you, but they say it will all be plain at the post-mortem." No doubt Turkey is pretty astute as to the attitude of Russia and Austria, and the Turks are not very likely to be highly influenced by Powers which are supposed to have that kind of interest in the provinces in question. As to the main essential point, the powers which ought to be placed in the Inspector-General who is to carry out the reforms, I think we all feel that it is now amply evident that what is needed is that he should have a large measure of independence of the Turkish Government and should be under the joint authority of the Governments interested, including that of Great Britain.

The noble Earl opposite said that Great Britain has a peculiar interest in this question. Of course we have permanent and immense interests in the whole matter, and we also have great responsibility. It is absolutely certain that those representing Turkey—I do not say always with the authority of Turkey—have committed, not only persecution, but intolerable outrages on women and children—outrages an account of the nature of which it would be impossible to read in any public assembly. The insurgents have not been guilty in the same degree.

These unspeakable crimes have been committed nominally under the ægis and auspices of the Turkish Government; and therefore I earnestly join in the hope that the noble Marquess, although he may not feel able to announce what particular steps he is recommending the Government to take, will be able to give us some assurance that the Government will not tolerate a continuance of these crimes but will insist on the reforms which have been indicated being carried out.

*The Lord BISHOP of ROCHESTER: My Lords, I desire to say a few words on this important question. I do not know whether the noble Lord who opened the debate will altogether welcome any support that might come to him from these Benches.

Lord NEWTON: Oh, certainly.

*The Lord BISHOP of ROCHESTER: The noble Lord referred to a natural ecclesiastical feeling. Well, my Lords, the word "ecclesiastical" is capable of a larger or a smaller denotation, and certainly if I or any other Bishop speaking here, represent an amount of ecclesiastical feeling in the narrower sense, I think it may be even more confidently asserted that he represents it in the largest sense possible.

Lord NEWTON: I beg the right rev. Prelate's pardon, but I did not use the word "ecclesiastical" in any offensive sense.

*The Lord BISHOP of ROCHESTER: I quite understand that. What I have chiefly in my mind is the condition of feeling in the country, and I am quite certain that, if those whom I directly represent feel acutely on the matter, those with whom I am not accustomed to act in many matters feel even more acutely—in other words that the Christian sentiment of the country has been deeply moved in this matter. Is there any fault in this? We feel, as Englishmen, sympathy immediately there is the least touch of injury to the honour or the interests of England. May we not as Christians feel as quickly for those who are linked to us in faith? But though it is true that we sympathise very specially with our fellow-Christians, our hearts go out to all sufferers, irrespective of religion or nationality. Yet I think that public feeling finds less expression than it would, from the very fact that the case is proved up to the hilt. It is pathetic when sufferings cease to move us only because they are so familiar and the arguments cease to bite only because we are so accustomed to their force. That is the case in this instance. But some people I know withhold their sympathy because the crimes of both sides are of a piece. What is the answer to that? The first that it is not true. It is among the debts which we owe to the noble Marquess that he has put this on record in his reply to the outrageous attempt of the Turkish Government to arrest our relief measures. The noble Marquess wrote—

> "I have no hesitation in saying that the ruin and destruction brought about by Turkish soldiers are greater than any resulting from the action of Bulgarian bands."

Secondly, if the bands have committed crimes, it is the unhappy people upon whom the sufferings and vengence fall. But I go further and I say that even if it is admitted that those who represent the revolutionary committees have done a great deal that was bad—and undoubtedly they have—still when we consider the history, and what the treatment of these provinces has been, is, and I am afraid looks as if for some time it will be, we must not judge them too severely. What I think people sometimes forget is that the dominant factor of the situation for many decades past has been the rule of a Power which our leading public men of all Parties have as it were taxed their vocabulary to characterise; and when we turn to the conduct of those who have suffered from having that Power over them what can we expect to find? Do we expect to find an advanced state of civilisation, of frankness, or of openness of behaviour? When people ask me to consider the behaviour of the Bulgarians it is that which I have in my mind.

A friend of mine told me yesterday that he did not think opinion was strongly moved because people said to themselves that these men, after all, were rebels, and rebels generally ought to be put down. I do not know whether many members of your Lordships' House will accept either the opinion or the authority if I recall what I remember hearing Mr. Gladstone say towards the end of his life. He said that whereas he had started by believing that in any case of collision between the rulers of a country and its subjects, the probabilities were nine to one that the rulers were right and the subjects wrong, he had ended by thinking that the case was exactly contrary. I do not think, however, that we need fall back on any generalisation of that kind, for it is absurd to talk about rebels when they have to serve under such a Government. What astonishes me is that any should judge the case without remembering that it is only one chapter more in a long and tragic history. In that history we have the same ghastly recurrences of cruelty, the same repetitions of diplomatic delays, the same suggested doubts on the part of, perhaps cynical, or, at least, critical opinion in our own country, and all the while the terrible undernote of both chronic and periodical suffering on the part of the population in these provinces. I wish we could have it brought before us in this House with the eloquence of some who have once sat upon its Benches, what that history is, and how it bears upon the case to-day. In my opinion it is idle to suppose that the troubles in the Balkan provinces can be removed except by practically neutralising the power of Turkey over the territory which she oppresses. I read a phrase used by the noble Earl the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs in another place, that "what is required in the Turkish provinces is not political change so much as thorough administrative reorganisation." I do not want to quarrel with a phrase, and if the administrative reorganisation is to get the Turk out of the way altogether, and only save his face and pay him compliments, then I can accept the noble Earl's phrase; but if it means anything short of that, it would appear to me a going back to the old state of things which has deceived us so often.

None of us can seriously doubt that the honour and duty of England are deeply involved in the existing state of affairs. Noble Lords have shown with humour and with seriousness what must, I think, be plain to all men, about the will and power of the two Powers to which the matter has been left. On the one side it looks to the outsider like a long farce; but, on the other, we know it has been a long tragedy of the most ghastly kind. Whether the noble Marquess has the power—I should not doubt that he had the will—to terminate this by some action of a more reasonable, commonsense, and practical sort, of course we outside cannot tell. But possibly the present condition of things which makes the hands of Russia full in the Far East will make it palpably clear that nothing really is to be hoped from the prolongation of the action that has already been so futile, and I hope, therefore, that the noble Marquess, true to the best instincts of English feeling and the noblest parts of British tradition, and appealing to what is generous in the minds of the great Mediterranean Powers, may be able, even now, to do something to establish in those lands a real rule, impartial, ordered, and strong, and so to bring about the deliverance of these unhappy peoples.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I feel sure that there can be but one opinion in this House as to the value of the debate to which we have just had the privilege of listening; and although there are, no doubt, some occasions when Ministers would gladly be spared the trouble of stating a Government case, I certainly feel that upon this occasion the speeches which have been delivered will strengthen our hands and give us courage in the course which we have been endeavouring to pursue, and I think also place us in a better position to pursue it with success. My noble friend who spoke first gave your Lordships a very interesting review of the recent history of affairs in the Balkan Peninsula. The noble Lord, using an unofficial freedom which I am afraid I cannot venture to imitate, belaboured—I will not say indiscriminately—all the parties to these unhappy transactions. He complained of the dilatoriness of the two Powers, of the stupidity of the Turkish Government, of the provocative tactics of the insurgents, and the excesses of the Turkish troops. I think there was reason for most of the complaints which he made; and when I consider how he laid about him, I am all the more grateful, because he not only spared me from a share in the blows, but gave me a few kindly words of encouragement and support.

I venture to agree with the noble Earl as to the futility of endeavouring to determine exactly how the responsibility for these terrible events should be distributed. I agree with the right rev. Prelate in believing that, at any rate within the last few months, the balance has inclined heavily on the Turkish side. I fancy that my noble friend Lord Newton who, with the frankness that characterises him, does not conceal his leaning towards Turkey, must have welcomed the first Blue-book as bearing out the view which he has sometimes supported in this House; but when he came to peruse the terrible tale in the pages of the second Blue-book he must have felt that it was no longer possible to represent these occurrences as entirely due to the agitation and the machinations of what we speak of as the Bulgarian bands. The fact is that we are surrounded by a vicious circle. On the one hand you have chronic and grievous misgovernment, which provokes and leads to outrage and agitation, and on the other you have the fact that the prevalence of this agitation renders the application of reforms doubly difficult. The question we have to consider is, what can His Majesty's Government do to bring about some improvement in a state of things which to all of us has appeared for a long time past intolerable.

But, my Lords, while I share the fierce indignation which these events have provoked, I desire to say one or two words as to the amount of responsibility which attaches to this country. I do not think stress has been laid on the point this evening, but it is constantly said that an extra share of responsibility devolves upon this country for the condition of affairs in the Balkan Peninsula. We are constantly told that it is due to our action in particular that in 1878 the Macedonian provinces were handed back to the tender mercies of the Turkish Government; and we are represented as having washed our hands of Macedonia and remained indifferent to its fate. That is, I think, a libel upon our country. The fact is that the Treaty of Berlin, which certainly withdrew a considerable portion of the European dominions of Turkey altogether from the control of that Power, abounded in provisions of precaution for the welfare of those parts of the Turkish Empire which were still left under Turkish authority. In particular, the 23rd Clause provided for the institution of local commissions which were to elaborate statutes and regulations for the future government of those parts of the Turkish Empire. Other provisions had reference to Eastern Rumelia and the Asiatic provinces of Turkey. But I confine myself for the moment to Macedonia. It is the greatest mistake to suppose that the Government of this country allowed those provisions of the Treaty of Berlin to be set aside or neglected. The records of the Foreign Office show a continuous series of efforts to give effect and reality to them. Throughout 1878 and 1879 we were constantly pressing for the production of these organic statutes. Local commissions were appointed, which displayed a most portentous amount of industry. At one moment a draft was in existence containing no less than 900 sections. In the beginning of 1880 the report of the local commissions were received, and they were referred to the European Commission which, under the treaty, had been formed for the purpose of providing an organic statute for the province of Eastern Rumelia. The Commission examined the report, and recommended its partial adoption; and the British Government in which the late Lord Granville was Foreign Secretary issued a circular to the Powers pressing them to put the new statute into force as soon as possible. But the Powers were half-hearted; the Porte was characteristically reluctant; then came troubles in Greece, then troubles in Montenegro, and then the Egyptian question, and the organic statute quietly sunk out of sight in the quicksands of European diplomacy. The attempt to secure improved administration of the Asiatic provinces of Turkey had very much the same fate. But no effort was neglected, so far as the Government of this country was concerned. There are on record vigorous warnings from Lord

Granville, from Lord Rosebery, and later on from Lord Salisbury. But again there arose international complications and troubles, and nothing was done. I have dwelt upon this chapter of history because there are conclusions to be drawn from it which are worth noting. In the first place, I think it shows that this country, at any rate, spared no effort to induce the other Powers to give effect to the provisions of the Berlin Treaty; and in the next place I cannot help thinking that the humiliating failure of all these remonstrances and negotiations shows that the European Concert is not always a very effective piece of machinery for bringing about practical measures of reform. Count Goluchowski lately spoke strongly of the cumbrous inefficiency of the European Concert as an instrument of reform. And when my noble friends animadvert so severely upon the failure of the two Powers concerned in the dual scheme, I think they should remember that the only alternative was a further recourse to the cumbrous machinery of the European concert, the results of which have shown themselves so disappointing in the past.

Now, even if there had been no question of treaty obligations in this matter, I entirely agree with what was said by the right rev. Prelate to the effect that it is our duty as a great Christian Power to do what we can to bring about a solid amelioration of the condition of things in the Balkan Peninsula. We have been told that the scheme put forward by Austria-Hungary and Russia is unsatisfactory and disappointing. Let me point out to those who criticise that scheme that it is the easiest thing in the world to draw up on paper a scheme for the reform of the European provinces of Turkey; but it is when you come to put a scheme of that kind into execution that your troubles begin. If you have got a clean slate to start with, if you can first pull down, it is not so difficult afterwards to build up; but in this case the ground is occupied; you have to deal with the existing Government of the Porte and its notorious recalcitrancy; you have to consider the susceptibilities of the other Powers; and lastly, but not least, you have to take into account the rivalries and animosities, often of the most pitiless kind, of the different races by whom that part of the Turkish Empire is occupied. We were in this position. We were offered in the beginning of last year the scheme of the two Powers which, from their geographical position and their political interests, were most immediately concerned. What were we to do? It has sometimes been suggested that His Majesty's Government, believing as they did that the scheme fell short of what is required, should have taken a line of their own and acted for themselves. My Lords, I say with deep conviction that I cannot conceive of any course of action which would have been less likely to bring about a speedy relief to the suffering Macedonians. We knew exactly how the matter was regarded by the other Powers. Russia and Austria-Hungary were, of course, deeply committed to their own project. Germany had made it plain that she had no desire to take an active part in pressing that or any other scheme upon the Turkish Government. France had officially undertaken to support the two Powers; and Italy, though I believe cordially anxious, then as now, to co-operate with us in giving reality to those reforms, had also declared herself for the time being content to accept the joint scheme. We should have had to act absolutely by ourselves; and I fail to see how any action of ours could have had the effect of bringing about what we most desire—the prompt relief of the suffering population of Macedonia. Any such action would have had one effect which I think you will agree with me would have been deplorable. It would have shown to the Turkish Government that there was discord amongst the Great Powers. We have, at any rate, in supporting the scheme of the two Powers, and endeavouring to improve it, been able to show a solid front to the Turkish Government, not I think, without good results.

The noble Earl on the Back Bench criticised the Murzsteg scheme. I will not deal with his criticisms because I think most of them are criticisms which I have made myself and which are officially recorded in the Blue-book. But the scheme was the best we could get, and I humbly conceive it was our duty to give it all the encouragement we could and to make it as effectual as possible. The noble Earl expressed the hope that I should be able to tell your Lordships something of the progress which has been made in giving effect to the programme of the two Powers. I think something has been accomplished. In the first place, we may fairly say that the appearance of the Murzsteg scheme had one important result, I mean the disbanding of the large force of irregular troops which the Turkish Government had during the summer maintained in the Balkan Peninsula. It certainly seems to me, judging from these Papers, that the falling off in the number of outrages and excesses coincided with the disbandment of the Ilaveh battalions, of which a large number throughout the year had been in occupation of Macedonia. Then the noble Earl made rather light of the appointment of the two European assessors. We did not regard their appointment as by any means an ideal arrangement; we agreed to accept it as an alternative for the more thoroughgoing and far-reaching arrangement which was indicated in our despatch. We hear, however, that the assessors are at this moment actually engaged at work, and we hope that good results may come from their efforts. But the point on which, for my part, I am most inclined to rely is the reorganisation of the Macedonian gendarmerie. I place that measure in the front rank in point of importance, because if we can put the gendarmerie upon a satisfactory footing we shall at any rate have something concrete to which we can point, and something which is not merely a paper reform.

Progress has certainly been made with regard to the gendarmerie. The Italian General has taken up his duties, and at this moment a number of staff officers, one deputed by each of the Powers, are engaged in the preparation of a scheme for the reorganisation of the force. Their meetings have, we hear, passed off satisfactorily, and although I cannot announce to your Lordships the final shape which their proposals have taken I am able to say that they are about to put forward a scheme under which the gendarmerie will be divided into a certain number of battalions, each battalion to be officered by officers deputed by a European Power, and entrusted with the custody of a particular section of the country. That seems to me to be a practical and business-like arrangement which ought to work well. We have already selected a certain number of British officers, I think six or eight is the number which has been spoken of, and I hope that before we are many days older it may be possible to send them out, and to place them at once in a position to commence the discharge of their duties.

Lord NEWTON: Who will pay them?

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE: They will be paid by the Turkish Government; but we propose that it should be arranged that they should not be liable to dismissal by the Turkish Government. I need not point out that the presence of a large number of European officers in Macedonia will be of the greatest value, not merely on account of the service which they will be able to render to the gendarmerie, but also because they will be there as trustworthy witnesses upon whom we shall be able to rely for some account of the manner in which events are passing in the country. I should also mention that the Turkish Government has assigned revenues, to the extent of £250,000, to provide a financial basis for putting the reorganised force on a proper footing. The noble Earl who spoke second suggested to me that the moment had come when we might brush aside the imperfect and inadequate proposals of the two Powers, and when we might put forward for acceptance more far-reaching proposals of our own. My Lords, we have from the first contemplated that it might become necessary for us to adopt this course; but I am bound to say that this particular moment seems to me to be ill-chosen for any such demonstration on our part. I hope I am not too sanguine, but I believe that in spite of all the delays that have taken place we never were nearer to the achievement of a certain amount of satisfactory progress than we are at this moment. If the gendarmerie can be reorganised, it is not too much to hope that the people of the Balkan Peninsula who are watching these events with so much anxiety may be reassured, and may be content to abstain from any action calculated to produce a fresh crisis at the beginning of the spring. I may be too sanguine, but I do earnestly hope that the experiment which is now being tried, and to which we are to some extent committed, will be given a fair trial. If it be, and if, after having received such a trial, fails to produce the results which we anticipate then I think noble Lords will be amply justified in reminding the Government of the pledges which they have given, and in calling upon them to put forward more drastic and more thorough measures of reform for these long-suffering provinces.

*EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I do not like this very interesting debate to close without making some observations on the part of those with whom I usually sit. I think the House may be congratulated on the remarkable debate that has taken place. I believe that the debate has on the whole truly represented the almost unanimous feeling which exists in this country on this great question at the present moment. What the country requires is that every effort that this Government and every other Christian and civilised Government can make, should be made to put an end, once for all, to the gross and grave disturbances which have occurred in the Balkan Peninsula. The noble Lord who opened the debate argued, I think, that the condition of those provinces was so acute and so dangerous that a complete reform must be made there. I welcome that statement from the noble Lord, for I fancy that on previous occasions he did not press so hardly on Turkey as some of us have done. The noble Lord mentioned one of the reasons why I think such heavy blame rests on Turkey, and why, as long as Turkey holds her power without restraint in these districts, there will always be great danger to the liberty and happiness of the people.

The noble Lord said that when we consider the agents of Turkey we must, perhaps, make some excuse for her. That is one of the grave considerations connected with this subject. In reference to these agents of Turkey, who have brought about disastrous results, it must be remembered that Turkey has brought into the European Provinces Asiatics whose ways are barbarous to the extremest degree; and she has also brought wild tribes on the West of Macedonia, the Albanian regiments, who, I think, are very little better. This is one of the reasons why I think pressure ought to be brought to bear on the Government of Turkey. We had the pleasure of listening to an eloquent speech from the noble Earl who spoke second in the debate. He brought forward, in a most lucid way, all the arguments that could be adduced from the Blue-books and from other sources to show the grave state of affairs existing in Macedonia. Then we had a speech which, I think, everyone in this House heard with the greatest pleasure, and which I am sure will be re-echoed throughout the country—I refer to the speech of the right rev. Prelate. I am sure that in the eloquent language which he used the right rev. Prelate voiced the feelings of the whole of the Episcopal Bench. He spoke most nobly as to the duties of England in this matter, and I fully share his view. This country has a deep and heavy responsibility.

The noble Marquess in his speech—and there is very little that I wish to seriously criticise in that speech—made some reference to what he called the extra share of responsibility which people sometimes say attaches to the British Government in this matter. I must say I feel very strongly that we have an extra share of responsibility. The noble Marquess referred to the clauses in the Treaty of Berlin, and told us how Secretary of State after Secretary of State had urged that these provisions should be carried out, and the noble Marquess seemed to think that with the representations that have been made to get the provisions of that treaty carried out we have relieved ourselves of our share of responsibility. That, no doubt, is quite correct with regard to the Treaty of Berlin? but the noble Marquess did not refer to the heavy responsibility which rested on this country with regard to the revocation and withdrawal of the previous treaty that had all but been wrung from Turkey by the Russian Government—I mean the Treaty of San Stefano. If that treaty had been carried out, would all these horrors and all this mismanagement have taken place? I think that in this respect alone we have a very heavy responsibility, and I venture to differ from the noble Marquess when he said we hardly had that extra share of responsibility which many people chose to put upon us.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Not a greater share of responsibility than any other Power.

*EARL SPENCER: Well, I do not know. It has always been one of the boasts of our friends opposite that they had the principal share of responsibility in doing away practically with the San Stefano arrangement. The noble Lord referred to Austria and Russia as being in the position of residuary legatees, having no great interest in carrying forward the negotiations and in bringing them to an issue. Well, I hardly understand that. They may have been dilatory in carrying out their scheme of reform, but I cannot think, as Lord Newton seems to imply, that these two Powers, which are by their geographical position in so much greater contact with the disturbed provinces than any other Power, can have any interest whatever in prolonging the unfortunate state of difficulty and difference. I cannot help thinking that their wish would be to see peace and good government reigning in that part of the world. We all know that Russia, in consequence of the unfortunate events that are going on in the Far East, will have her hands very full, and that may make a considerable difference in the amount of pressure which she will be able to bring to bear on Turkey in this matter. I sincerely trust that in that event other Powers will step in and supply the necessary pressure, and that reforms in Macedonia will not suffer by what is going on elsewhere. I entirely associate myself with what the right rev. Prelate so well said in regard to many passages in the noble Marquess's despatches. I think the greatest possible praise must be given to the noble Marquess, and I feel I cannot use too strong words of praise for the very noble and dignified reproof which he gave to the Turkish Government when they appealed to him not to protect those who were going from this country to relieve the unfortunate people who are suffering in Macedonia, and I am quite sure the whole country will be grateful to him for the attitude and the line which he took up in this respect. The noble Marquess referred to the fact that the Austrian Foreign Minister had commented upon the cumbrous inefficiency of the European concert. We know what the noble Marquess the late Foreign Secretary said with regard to the European concert—that it was like a steam roller, very powerful, but very slow. I rather gathered that the noble Marquess was hoping to bring greater pressure to bear on the European concert. It would be interesting to know how he can bring that pressure to bear upon it. I remember how the European concert was outdone entirely by another method in the case of Crete. I am afraid that can hardly be done on this occasion. The European concert was unable to effect reforms which were required in Crete, but they were carried out efficiently by a distinguished friend of mine, a gallant naval officer who at that time was in command of our ships there. The late Lord Salisbury at that time gave very high praise to the efficacy of naval diplomacy. He praised Admiral Noel in that way. But I am afraid the noble Marquess will hardly get the assistance of the Navy in Macedonia. That distinguished and gallant officer is now in a very difficult place, for I rather think he commands, or is about to command, our Fleet in China. I was glad to hear from the noble Marquess a repetition of what he said some time ago with regard to a Christian Governor-General. But, unfortunately, on that occasion he gave the two Powers an alternative, and they took the lesser of the two, and instead of following the much wiser advice of the noble Marquess by pressing for the appointment of a Christian Governor-General who should act independently, they were content with two assessors.

I sincerely trust that the noble Marquess will be able to renew his representations as to the appointment of a Christian Governor-General to the two Powers, especially as they seem almost inclined now to follow his advice. I fear that without that being done there is little chance of the establishment of good government in the country. The noble Marquess attaches immense importance to the proper and efficient reorganisation of the gendarmerie; but I fear, from what we hear, that the appointment of the distinguished Italian general has been so recent that he will hardly have time, before the spring comes on, to have the force in working order. I sincerely trust, however, that the hopes of the noble Marquess may be realised, because the establishment of a thoroughly good gendarmerie would conduce more than anything else to a satisfactory settlement of the country. I noticed with satisfaction that the noble Marquess does not consider that the proposals made by the two Powers are adequate for what is required. All I can say is that I am quite sure the country will support him with vigour and enthusiasm if he presses forward with all the strength and influence of His Majesty's Government such changes as will make the reforms adequate.

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, I have no intention of detaining your Lordships, but I should like to remind my noble friend the Foreign Minister that he has not said whether he is going to lay any further Papers or not. With regard to the measures upon which the noble Marquess relies for the preservation of peace, I only desire to make one observation. It is this—and I think everyone present will agree with me—that these measures to be really effective ought to have been put in operation months ago by the Austrian and Russian Governments. As to the speech of my noble friend, I will only say I hope he will be justified in the somewhat optimistic view he takes of the future.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: We shall present further Papers, but I do not think immediately. When my noble friend put his notice down at the beginning of the session he had only one of the two Blue-books in his possession. The second Blue-book has been presented since his notice was on the Paper.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE CASE OF MR. McCULLY.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to call the attention of His Majesty's Government to the gross treatment at Buenos Ayres of Mr. Edward McCully, chief officer of the British ship "Kambira," who, upon the suggestion of the British Consul at that port, was lodged in an Argentine gaol, where he existed for fifty-seven days without trial under the most degrading conditions; to ask whether it is a fact that, on the case being tried, it was at once dismissed by the Federal Judge on the ground of his having no jurisdiction; if so, whether His Majesty's Government have taken any steps regarding the Consul referred to; and whether they are prepared to compensate Mr. McCully for the serious injury and expense sustained by him owing to the extraordinary way in which he was dealt with by an official representing British interests abroad?

I think it highly necessary that I should draw your attention and that of His Majesty's Government to this very serious matter, and particularly so because it disturbs our confidence in the representatives of this country abroad in their dealings with those of our fellow-subjects who have the right of protection at their hands. In putting the case as briefly as possible, I may say that the chief officer named in my notice was charged at the British Consulate by certain members of his crew with certain acts of cruelty and ill-treatment. Under Sections 480, 481, and 483 of the Merchant Shipping Act, the British Consul had full powers to immediately call a naval Court consisting of not more than five and not less than three persons, with himself as President, in order to thoroughly investigate the charges. All the necessary witnesses could have been called immediately, and the Court would have the power to suspend or cancel the officer's certificate, to call upon him to forfeit the whole or any part of his wages, to pay the whole or a part of the costs of the Court out of his wages, or, under Section 689 of the same Act, the Consul could have inquired into the case upon oath. Then, if it so required, he could have despatched the offender, as soon as practicable, in safe custody to any British possession in which there is a Court capable of taking cognizance of the offence, to be there proceeded against according to the law.

What, however, were the methods adopted by the British Consul at Buenos Ayres? Throwing aside his own responsibility and powers—for what cause I am at a loss to think, except that it was sheer laziness—he handed Mr. McCully over to the tender mercies of the Argentine police authorities. Not content with this arbitrary act, he despatched a note to these authorities to the effect that Mr. McCully had conducted himself in a brutal manner towards several of the crew, and he was sorry that he could not give a complete list of the other members of the crew who had been the victims of the mate's fury. He ended by asking the judge to pass the severest sentence against the said chief officer as a lesson to men who are accustomed to act in this way. Assuming for the moment that the chief officer in question was guilty of the charges, such a communication to foreign authorities cannot be too strongly condemned. The Consul gave the chief officer no opportunity of defending himself, and his action can only be characterised as an outrage on British justice. It is all the worse when perpetrated by a responsible official of our Government, who himself had full power to deal with the case.

What was the result of this Consul's extraordinary communication? The chief officer, Mr. McCully, was at first locked up without a bed, and for the first twenty-seven hours had nothing to eat, being ultimately sent to the city prison, and compelled to linger, under the vilest conditions, in close confinement for no fewer than fifty-seven days. The captain of the ship on which the cruelties were alleged to have been committed stated without hesitation that the whole thing was a conspiracy. The crew swore or made statements against the chief officer of cruelty committed on the passage and whilst in Canadian ports; these cruelties he never heard of until he was called before the Consul. It is a very fortunate fact that Mr. McCully had some friends in the port—members of the Merchant Service Guild—who, by means of subscriptions and in other ways, took the matter up. Otherwise the likelihood is that Mr. McCully would have been languishing in gaol even yet. Perhaps your Lordships may remember the case of the steamer "Greylands" which I brought to your notice, where two officers and five seamen were kept in gaol at the same port (Buenos Ayres) for nearly five months without trial.

Lord Muskerry.

I understand that the Merchant Service Guild have made very strong representations on this case of Mr. McCully to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and it is noteworthy that the Buenos Ayres Herald, and other papers in that quarter, printed in our own language, commented in no measured terms on the acts of so-called British representatives at the port. The Foreign Office, in reply to the Merchant Service Guild, bear out the fact that, as I have stated, a naval Court would have been competent to investigate the charges brought against Mr. McCully, and that it is the usual and most desirable course for a Consul to follow in summoning such a naval Court. The Foreign Office remarked that it was unfortunate that the charges did not come to the notice of the Consul until the necessary witnesses had disappeared. Surely in view of this fact his action was the more unjustifiable and injudicial. We have the right to expect our representatives to act with a better sense of justice and judgment than this. It seems that the Consul appears to have been anxious, as he states, to check the ill-treatment to which seamen on Nova Scotian vessels are sometimes subjected. I am glad to hear that the Merchant Service Guild have protested against any such assumption, which they say is based on what is practically ancient history, and for which there is no actual foundation at the present time. At the same time I very strongly contend that ill-treatment or no ill-treatment, the case of Mr. McCully has been handled in a shocking manner. The Guild, I believe, are informed that both the Board of Trade and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs deprecate the practice of handing over a British subject to be dealt with by local authorities for offences alleged to have been committed on board a British vessel, when the recognised machinery for dealing with the case under British law can possibly be employed. They are also of opinion that the Consul should not have asked that Mr. McCully should be punished with the greatest severity which the law allows, inasmuch as by so doing he seemed to prejudice the case and to lay himself open to a suspicion of animus against the accused. I do not know whether your Lordships would consider "suspicion" quite the right term. I should call it an intemperate and wilfully malicious statement.

I hope that I have indicated to your Lordships how the interests of British ships are attended to by our representatives at Buenos Ayres, and I trust that you will agree with me that their action merits direct condemnation and censure at the hands of His Majesty's Government. There remains the fact that, apart from personal suffering and degradation, the chief officer of the ship "Kambira" has been subjected to very great expense, and the least that His Majesty's Government can do is to offer some compensation as a solatium. I have read in one of our leading shipping Dailies of three Danish seamen, against whom an unsubstantiated charge of mutiny and setting fire to a British barque on the high seas was preferred at Dover, who received an indemnity from the Treasury, together with the wages alleged to have been withheld from them by the British Consul who sent them to England. If it is the case that His Majesty's Government are able to act in this way towards foreign seamen in our ships, there is no possible excuse for not granting one of our own subjects, a chief officer of a British ship, practical consideration of a similar nature. The last instance of a British officer being badly treated was in Japan, and the noble Marquess very kindly interested himself in the matter. The result was that the judge and officials concerned were punished and the noble Marquess very kindly put forward a suggestion that the Japanese Government should pay a certain sum by way of compensation. I think the sum they finally offered was 5s. 6d. I hope His Majesty's Government will be prepared to grant a more substantial sum than that to Mr. McCully for the serious injury and expense sustained by him owing to the extraordinary way in which he has been dealt with by an official representing British interests abroad.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I have made inquiries into this case and have been informed that on the arrival of the ship referred to the crew made a number of complaints to the British Consul, Mr. Ross, of the manner in which they had been ill-treated by Mr. McCully, the chief officer. The complaints, which were of a serious kind, referred to various acts of cruelty, and in particular to a case in which Mr. McCully was alleged to have knocked down an able seaman and kicked four of his teeth out while the man was lying down. The same seaman was said to have had three of his fingers injured by a blow from a capstan bar. There were other complaints. These had reference partly to occurrences which took place during the voyage, and partly to occurrences which took place in port. I believe I am right in saying that the Argentine Courts are competent to deal with cases of this kind when they occur within an Argentine port. But be that as it may, I agree with the noble Lord that the whole of these cases, whether they occurred in port or during the voyage, ought properly to have been referred to a naval Court. Mr. Ross, however, who evidently took a very serious view of these complaints, acting under a misapprehension, referred the case to the local Courts. The result was that Mr. McCully was imprisoned. The Courts were in vacation at the time and bail was refused by the local authorities. Mr. Ross did all he could to hasten the trial, and when it took place the Court, for reasons of which I am not aware, but which the noble Lord perhaps knows, decided that the offences were outside its jurisdiction, possibly because the particular offences specified took place during the voyage and not in port. Our view is that Mr. Ross, whose record in the Consular Service is a highly creditable one—he has the honour of being a Companion of the Order of the Bath, awarded to him in recognition of Consular Service—committed an error of judgment in sending the case to the local Court; and no doubt it would have been much better if he had not expressed a strong opinion, as he appears to have done, in regard to the culpability of an accused person. Our view has been intimated to Mr. Ross, who, I have no doubt, will have taken the reproof—for it is a reproof—to heart. I am advised that the case is not one for which any claim for compensation could be admitted by His Majesty's Government.

House adjourned, at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

Sights of Guns on H.M.S. "Venerable" and "Ramillies."

MR. HARMSWORTH (Caithness-shire): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if his attention has been drawn to the fact that a shot fired from one of the 12-inch guns of H.M.S. "Venerable," during recent practice firing in the Mediterranean, passed between the funnels of H.M.S. "Gladiator;" and, if so, will he state whether this was caused by defective sights on the gun in question.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) No report to this effect has been received. If such an incident did occur it was certainly not due to the sights.

Mr. HARMSWORTH: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he can state whether the sighting of the turret guns of the "Ramillies" has been found to be defective; and, if so, what steps have been taken to remedy the defects.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman.) The "Ramillies" returned from the Mediterranean and paid off in the autumn. She is now undergoing refit and having her upper deck guns casemated. The sights of the turret guns will be brought up to date as far as the nature of the mounting will allow.

Admiralty Shipbuilding Programme.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will explain why, in view of the statement of the late Secretary to the Admiralty upon the 23rd June, 1903, that the battleships of the 1903–4 programme would be laid down at an early date and be built by contract, the said ships were not laid down before January, 1904, and are being built in the Government dockyards; and whether the Admiralty adhere to the intention they expressed in August, 1903, of laying down three battleships in April next.

(Answered by Mr. Pretyman). The hon. Member will find the matter referred to in his Question fully dealt with in the Memorandum of the First Lord accompanying the Estimates, which will very shortly be laid upon the Table; and I suggest the hon. Member should kindly defer any Question he may have to ask till after he has read that statement.

Parliamentary Inquiries into Depression in Agriculture.

MR. FREDERICK WILSON (Norfolk, Mid.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state how many Parliamentary inquiries were held on the depression in agriculture last century, before the repeal of the Corn Laws, while protective tariffs existed, and the price of corn when these inquiries into depression were made; and describe the nature of the tariffs which existed.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) Parliamentary Committees on agricultural distress sat in the years 1820, 1821 and 1822, 1833, and 1836. Full particulars as to the prices of corn in these years, and as to the tariffs in force, are contained in the Return "Customs Tariffs of the United Kingdom from 1800 to 1897" [C. 8706 of 1897]. See pages 243, 244, 247, and 255.

Chiefs Clerks to Surveyors of Taxes.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will say whether it is intended to comply with the recommendation of the surveyors of taxes for the establishment of a class of chief clerks in their offices.

(Auswered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) No recommendation to the effect described in the Question has been received by the Board of Inland Revenue.

Alleged Exemption of Irish Roman Catholic Clergy from Income Tax.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will explain why the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland are exempted from the payment of income-tax.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) The hon. Member appears to be under some misapprehension. The Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland have no special exemption from income-tax.

Annual Saving in Irish Administration.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the amount of the annual saving effected in the Irish administration; and whether he proposes to keep an account of the savings as well as the expenditure, so that the money due to Ireland shall not be lost sight of.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) As the Estimates for Irish Services are not yet completely closed, it is impossible to say at present what reduction will be shown in the estimated expenditure in 1904–5. The Annual Financial Relations Returns afford a comparative record of the cost of Irish Services in successive years.

Inspection of Boarded-out Pauper Children in Scotland.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if, in view of the fact that boarded-out pauper children in Scotland are not inspected systematically by the general superintendents of poor under the Local Government Board, he will consider the expediency of having the children periodically inspected, preferably by lady inspectors under the Local Government Board, as in England and in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Graham Murray.) I am informed by the Local Government Board for Scotland that complaints in regard to children boarded out are of extremely rare occurrence. The subject has been before the Departmental Committee on Medical Relief in Scotland, and when the Report of that Committee is issued the Board will consider whether any action on the lines indicated is necessary or advisable.

Plans of the House of Commons

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE: To ask the hon. Member for Chorley, as representing the First Commissioner of Works, if copies of the plans of the House, similar to those exhibited in the Tea Room, can be obtained by Members by payment or otherwise.

(Answered by Lord Balcarres.) These plans are prepared for official purposes and the First Commissioner is not prepared to distribute or sell them.

Sanitary Inspectors' Certificates.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): To ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state the number of persons seeking certificates of competency as sanitary inspectors who have been examined in each year by the Board of Examinations constituted by the Local Government Board under Section 108 of The Public Health (London) Act, 1891, and the number to whom certificates of competency have been granted in each year.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) I am informed that the numbers are as follows:—

Year.	Number of Applicants for Certificates.	Number of Certificates granted.

Officers in Indian Native Regiments—Rank other than Military.

COLONEL DENNY (Kilmarnock Burghs): To ask the Secretary of State for India if officers in the Indian Army serving in Native regiments hold any rank except that granted by the Sovereign, and notified in the Military Gazette; and, if so, who confers this rank, and under what authority.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The answer is in the negative.

Public Libraries in Ireland.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state how many rural district councils in Ireland have availed themselves of the Public Libraries Act of 1902, and will he give their names.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) This information will be procured from the local authorities and communicated to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Certificates for Trained Nurses in Ireland.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give the names of the institutions in Ireland considered competent by the Local Government Board to give certificates for trained nurses within the meaning of the first portion of the Nursing Order; the names of the institutions in Ireland considered competent to give certificates for qualified nurses within the meaning of the second portion of said Order; and the position of nurses (who have been in the service of boards of guardians previous to the said Orders and whose service had been satisfactory) as to promotion to other offices, increase in salaries, or appointment to posts in other unions.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) There is no official record kept of institutions fulfilling the requirements of Articles 2 (a) and 2 (b) of the Order in question. The claims of a particular hospital or institution are only considered as the necessity arises in connection with the registration of a nurse or upon the application of the authorities of the hospital. Hence there may be and doubtless are hospitals which would be held by the Board to be competent to certify nurses as trained or qualified should the occasion for making inquiry arise. Nurses whose employment in union hospitals had been sanctioned by the Board prior to the issue of the Order have not been disturbed in office; their rights have been carefully preserved to them. In no case has promotion or increase of salary been refused to any such nurse on the ground that she did not possess the qualifications prescribed by the Order.

Building of Technical Schools in Ireland.

Mr. FFRENCH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Agricultural and Technical Instruction (Ireland) Act provides no funds for building purposes; and whether, in view of the danger of technical instruction coming to a standstill, or the local bodies ceasing to provide it, he will introduce a Bill providing funds for the building and equipping of technical schools in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) I discussed this matter with the deputation that waited on me in Dublin on the 11th January, and have no further statement to make at present.

Collection of County Rates in Ireland.

Mr. FFRENCH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Wexford County Council passed a resolution requesting the Irish Local Government Board to alter the dates for closing the collection of county rates from the 31st March and 30th September to 1st May and 1st November, and that the Local Government Board refused to do so owing to the existing state of the law; and if so, whether, for the convenience of both ratepayers and collectors, he would undertake to bring about the proposed alteration either by legislation or otherwise.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The financial half-years are fixed by the Local Government Act, 1898, and the Orders made thereunder, and the Board has no power to vary these dates. The present arrangements involve no hardship on the ratepayers, and the collection of the rates has been characterised by remarkable punctuality. It is not proposed to introduce legislation with the object suggested in the Question.

Irish Land Act.

Mr. FFRENCH: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the advisability of inserting a clause in the Bill which he proposes to introduce to amend the Irish Land Act, 1903, bringing tenants of agricultural farms, holding under grants in perpetuity (not being grants under the provisions of the Renewable Leasehold Conversion Act) dated subsequent to the 1st January, 1861, within the scope of the Act.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The classes of tenants described in the Question, if in occupation of their holdings, are within the scope of the Land Purchase Acts. I am not aware that any amendment of the law in this respect is required.

Belfast Revaluation.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Commissioner of Valuation in Ireland undertook to hear the views of appellants against the Belfast revaluation in person before publishing his revised appeal list; that he invited some of the public bodies to appoint representatives to meet him, and interviewed some classes of Belfast merchants and also delegates from a ratepayers' committee; and, if so, will he explain why the Commissioner did not hear the Belfast publicans, whose valuations have been increased from £27,000 to £63,000.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Commissioner undertook to arrange interviews with the leading mercantile and other public bodies, as well as with individuals whose valuations were seriously affected by the revaluation. In September, 1901, he met a deputation of the Belfast licensed vintners, and in November, 1903, a leading member of that body, who put forward very clearly the views of the licensed vintners.

Indian Officers.

COLONEL DENNY: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether Paragraph 5 of the Royal Warrant of the 17th January, 1861, which provides that officers of the staff corps holding military appointments will take military command according to their Army rank, is still applicable to officers of the Indian Army.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The answer is in the affirmative.

COLONEL DENNY: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether Section 71 of the Army Act, which prohibits a combatant officer being subjected to the command of another of inferior rank, is applicable to officers of the Indian Army serving with Native regiments.

Military Camp in Roxburghshire.

MR. THOMAS SHAW (Hawick Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland what is the state of the negotiations with regard to the purchase of the estate of Stobs, Roxburghshire, and adjoining land for the purposes of a military camp and military training; has a purchase been arranged or is it to be abandoned; are any arrangements being made for leasing property; and what is the extent of the lands which are the subject of transaction.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER, Belfast, W.): The Stobs Estate, 3,615 acres in extent, has been purchased. As regards the purchase of certain adjoining lands, the negotiations now proceeding have not reached a stage at which any disclosure in regard to their nature or the extent of the land concerned would be expedient. I regret, there ore, that I am not in a position to give the hon. and learned Member the information which he desires to obtain. I may add that at present no arrangements are being made for leasing any property in this neighbourhood.

The Irish Militia.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the Official Minutes of Lord Wolseley, dated 3rd November, 1897, contained in the Appendices to the Report Volume of the War Commission, p. 247, in which he stated that the War Office could not afford to explain in Parliament or make otherwise public, the fact that Irish Militia are brought to England to draw the teeth of possible rebellion; and whether, having regard to the different reasons already given by the War Office authorities relative to the transference of Irish Militia to this country, he has any, and, if so, what, explanation of Lord Wolseley's Minute.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I understand that the opinion expressed by Lord Wolseley was a personal one, and I have no knowledge of the reasons which led him to entertain the view he expressed in 1897. I have no reason to believe that Irish soldiers will prove traitors to their King or false to their military oath. The admirable and faithful performance of their duty by Irishmen in the service of the Crown adds to the improbability of any such action. As a matter of fact, the great majority of the Irish Militia perform their training in Ireland.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman, in order to encourage enlistment, have this Memorandum of Lord Wolseley's placarded at every recruiting station in Ireland?

82nd Battery R.F.A.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the 82nd Battery R.F.A., who have been in South Africa four years, are still under canvas, and that the War Office propose to send the families of the men to South Africa while there are no quarters in which to house them, he will consider the advisability of putting these men in barracks by bringing home some one of the other units who are on the list for service in India shortly.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Every effort is being made to find suitable accommodation for the families of the troops which will be retained in South Africa, and the General Officer Commanding reports that the families can be accommodated in Indian pattern tents, which are specially suited for this purpose. I am afraid that the suggestion of the hon. Member is impracticable, as there are no barracks at home available for the units alluded to. I may add that in the case of this battery only two families have elected to go out.

The Imperial Yeomanry.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that according to the Imperial Yeomanry Training Return for 1903 just published, it appears that out of an establishment of 34,594 no fewer than 8,293 are wanting to complete, that 2,593 were absent from training, and that out of a total of 22,610 horses, 10,667 were hired, he will state what steps he proposes to take in order to place this force upon a more satisfactory footing.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: When the maximum of about 35,000 was fixed in 1901, the enrolled numbers stood at about 10,000 and those at training in the previous year amounted to 8,657. Since that time the numbers enrolled have risen to 27,054 on 1st January last, and the number at training in 1903 amounted to 23,779. These figures show very satisfactory progress. As regards the horses, without incurring considerable extravagance, it has been found impracticable to avoid hiring.

CAPTAIN NORTON: Am I to understand that although this is still a paper force, it is less a paper force than it was?

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: The hon. Member must understand nothing of the kind. A high establishment has been fixed, and a greater approximation to it has been attained every year. The recruiting for the Yeomanry has been most satisfactory.

Irish Tailors and Officers' Uniforms.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the fact that the adjutants of the Connaught Rangers, the Royal Irish Regiment, the Engineers, and the adjutants of other regiments stationed in Ireland are recommending young officers on joining these regiments to send for their outfits to certain English houses, and that in consequence orders placed by officers in Ireland have been countermanded; and whether in view of the loss to Irish firms by this conduct, he will take such steps as will put a stop to such practices by the adjutants or other officers in Ireland.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: A particular instance occurred in 1903 in which a Commanding Officer gave orders to a young officer to obtain his uniform from selected firms and instructions have been sent forbidding any such action. I am not, however, aware that such action is the practice, and I shall be glad if the hon. Member would draw my attention to any further cases which have come within his knowledge.

MR. NANNETTI: Has not a special order been issued by the Commander-in-Chief to adjutants in Ireland making this recommendation?

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I am not aware of it.

Mr. NANNETTI: I will send the hon. Gentleman some information on the subject.

Military Courts-Martial.

Mr. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state the number of Court-martial proceedings which in the year 1903 were submitted to the Judge Advocate General's Department in London; in how many cases findings were quashed; in how many cases in which soldiers were sentenced the punishment or part of it had been served before the findings were quashed, or before a remission of the whole or part of the sentence; and whether any, and what, steps have been taken to check the increase of illegalities of Courts-martial.

*Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: During 1903 the proceedings of 11,232 Courts-martial were received in the Judge Advocate General's Office, and in 72 cases the proceedings were wholly quashed. In all cases in which a sentence of imprisonment had been confirmed and then ultimately quashed by the Judge Advocate General, a portion, at least, of the sentence had necessarily been served. As regards the last part of the Question, a circular letter has been recently issued to General Officers Commanding, with the object of preventing the cases of illegality in future.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Having regard to the fact that the Judge Advocate General is no longer a Minister responsible to this House——

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! Notice must be given of the Question.

Indian State Railway Contracts.

Sir CHARLES McLAREN (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will for the future adopt the system recently put in force by the London County Council in settling contracts for rails and railway material, by giving preference in all cases in which there is no wide divergence in price, to the tenders of English makers over those of foreign makers; and whether he will allow English firms the opportunity of revising their tenders in cases where foreign firms tender at lower prices.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): The practice described in the Question is that which is now in force in respect of stores for State railways in India. In cases where there is no material difference in price and where in other respects the tenders are equally satisfactory or nearly so, a preference will unquestionably be given to a British tender. Where there is a wide difference in price and the quality of supply is reckoned identical, it is impossible, in justice to the Indian taxpayer, to ignore the lower tender. Large contracts for steel and other goods are executed for the Indian Government by Sheffield firms, and I doubt whether any distress in Sheffield can be attributed, as the hon. Member suggests, to the diversion to foreign firms of Indian Government orders in a very limited number of instances. The hon. Member, no doubt, is careful to distinguish between the action of Government, which affects only the State lines, and that of the Indian railway companies, in respect of the purchase of stores.

Sir CHARLES McLAREN: Can the right hon. Gentleman answer the latter part of the Question.

Mr. BRODRICK: It would be contrary to the principle on which contracts are made to allow an opportunity of revising the tenders.

In reply to a further Question by Mr. Galloway (Manchester, S. W.), Mr. Brodrick said the question of the dates of delivery was always carefully considered.

German Contracts for Indian Railways.

Sir CHARLES McLAREN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in the case of the orders for tyres and axles recently given by the Indian railways to German makers, the specification as to analysis and breaking tests on which the German makers tendered was identical with that on which the English makers tendered; whether inspectors on behalf of the Indian railways were attached to the German works during the execution of the contracts; whether any, and if any, what tests were imposed on the tyres and axles when delivered; and whether he will in future, in cases where an order is given to a foreign firm, cause the lowest price tendered by an English firm together with the price taken by the foreign firm, to be published here.

MR. BRODRICK: In the case of the order for wheels and axles recently given by the Secretary of State in Council to German manufacturers, to which I presume the hon. Member refers, the specification as to analysis and breaking tests was identical with that on which the English makers tendered. Inspectors on behalf of the Secretary of State are attached to the German works during the execution of this contract. A copy of the specification showing the tests can be handed to the hon. Member if he so desires. I do not propose to depart from the established practice of declining to divulge the prices at which German, or any other firms, have tendered.

SIR THOMAS DEWAR (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he will state the number and value of contracts for railway plant placed by Indian railways with foreign makers during the last five years, and what percentage of these contracts were secured by German firms.

MR. BRODRICK: The contracts entered into with foreign firms by the Secretary of State in Council in respect of material for Indian State railways during the last five years are eight in number, their total value is £135,567; and 25 per cent. of these contracts were secured by German firms. As regards contracts made by Indian railway companies, I am unable to give the information asked for. I may add that the total orders for material given during this period amounted to £4, 200,000. The percentage, therefore, of orders given to foreign firms was 3½ of the whole.

Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, as requested in his telegram of the 16th January last, express provisions have been introduced into the Transvaal Ordinance for the treatment and care of Chinese labourers on voyage out and home; and whether the transport will be confined to British vessels and the landing to British ports.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): No express provision has been introduced, but I have informed Lord Milner that adequate provision will have to be made by regulation. The point raised will be fully considered. At present it is contemplated, as appears from Lord Milner's statement in the Blue-book, to make use of Durban as the port of landing.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the persons specified in Section 8 of the draft Transvaal Labour Importation Ordinance, whose duty it will be to explain to Chinese labourers the terms of their contracts, will be persons selected and employed by the British Government.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I am in communication with Lord Milner as to the details of the arrangements under Section 8, but His Majesty's Government undertake that the terms of the contract will be explained to the labourers before their departure by some person appointed by and responsible to the Government.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies for what reason the definition in the first draft of the Transvaal Labour Importation Ordinance of the premises to which Chinese labourers are to be confined, so as to include a circle of one mile round the place where they are working, has been struck out; and what meaning is to be attached to the term premises in Sections 18, 19, and 20 of the amended draft of the Ordinance.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I am informed by Lord Milner that the definition of the term premises in the first draft was omitted, as, under it, owing to the position of certain mines in Johannesburg, the labourers would have uncontrolled access to the most populous portions of the city, which was deemed undesirable. The matter will be settled by regulation.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Transvaal Government has made any examination of the signatures to the petition in favour of Chinese labour; if so, how many of these signatures were found to be genuine, and of these how many were duplicates.

*MR. LYTTELTON: Lord Milner reported by telegram on 28th January that the petition bearing 47,000 signatures of males only over sixteen years of age, which has been presented to the Council was collected with care and is entitled to as much consideration as such a method of ascertaining popular opinion ever can be. I have no further information.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: Are we to understand that the Government have made no examination of the signatures?

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have no further information to give.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): Is it not the fact that a considerable number of white miners have been dismissed because they would not sign the petition.

*MR. LYTTELTON: No such information has reached me.

DR. MACNAMARA: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire?

[No answer was returned.]

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will consider the desirableness of deferring the debate on the proposed Ordinance for the introduction of indentured Asiatic labour into the Transvaal Colony, until the House is in possession of the whole correspondence between the Colonial Office and the High Commissioner respecting the changes which have been made in the text of the proposed Ordinance.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have to-day received a telegram from Lord Milner confirming my belief that no further changes have been made in the Ordinance in addition to those published in Cd. 1898. I do not propose to defer the debate.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I understand that the right hon. Gentleman has no further information from Lord Milner in regard to these Amendments that he can lay on the Table. Can he not put the House in possession of Lord Milner's reasons for the very drastic changes which have been made in the Ordinance during its passage through the Legislative Council?

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have no information or Papers to produce on the subject.

MR. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state by whom is the person mentioned in Section 8 of the Ordinance to be appointed, and is he to be resident in China or South Africa; and is the unwitnessed certificate which he presents to the importer in South Africa to be the sole guarantee the Government will have that the labourer is made fully aware of the terms of the contract.

*MR. LYTTELTON: There is to be a protector of the Chinese in the Transvaal, and a representative of the Government will be in China to see that the conditions of the contract are fully explained to the Chinese labourers there and that they are fully understood by them.

MR. BUCHANAN: Is this official, who is to explain to the Chinese the terms of their contract, to be resident in South Africa or in China?

*MR. LYTTELTON: The Ordinance does not secure that there shall be an official in China. The objection which I have endeavoured to meet by the pledge I have given, is that a Chinaman might arrive at Durban and find out there for the first time from the explanation given to him by the official the true nature of the contract; so I have taken measures, which I have indicated, to secure that the contract shall be understood before he leaves China.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): As a simple and downright matter of fact, will these Chinamen not be treated as slaves?

Recruitment of Labour in China.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has now received a reply to his communication to Lord Milner as to the method of the proposed recruitment of labour in China, by whom it is to be carried on, and what security there is to be that labourers before they leave China will be fully informed of the terms and restrictions of their contract.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: I have not yet received a reply to my inquiries.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Shall we get the information before the debate is commenced?

[No answer was returned.]

Conveyance of Labour to the Transvaal.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether provision will be made in the regulations relating to the importation of labourers into the Transvaal that the labourers shall be conveyed in British ships so as to secure their proper treatment during the voyage.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: The conveyance of the labourers in British ships is a matter which will be carefully considered, but in any case the proper treatment of the labourers during the voyage is a question the importance of which I fully recognise, and every precaution will be taken to secure such treatment.

British Columbian Labour Legislation.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in the year 1902, the Legislature of British Columbia passed an Act restricting immigration; whether the Japanese Minister for Foreign Affairs protested against it, in so far as it applied to Japanese subjects; whether the Act was in consequence disallowed by the Governor-General, with the sanction of the Imperial Government; whether an Act to the same effect was passed in 1903, and again disallowed; whether a Bill in similar terms has again been introduced; whether, if it becomes an Act, His Majesty's Government will again sanction its disallowance; and whether any correspondence on the subject can be laid upon the Table.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: The answer to the first three sections of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. I have no information as to either the disallowance of the Act of 1903 or as to the re-introduction of a similar Bill, and I am not prepared to pledge myself in advance as to the course I might think it desirable to take in such circumstances. There has been no recent correspondence on the subject, but there is no objection to laying such Papers as there are, if the House desires it.

Convict Labour in the Transvaal Mines.

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that at a meeting of the Chamber of Mines, held in Johannesburg on 19th November last, a letter was read from the Transvaal Government offering 1,000 more native convicts for the mines; and, if so, will he state whether this offer was accepted, what is the total number of convicts so employed, what is the nature of the offences for which they have been convicted, and on what terms are they supplied to the mines.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Lord Milner informs me that he does not know of any special offer by the Government of 1,000 men to the Chamber of Mines in November. Since 1901 a certain number of convicts have been employed on the Transvaal mines, as has been the practice for many years at Kimberley, where an average of 1,200 convicts are permanently employed on mines. At present 850 convicts are so employed on the Rand. The Government agreement with mining companies stipulates that they shall only be employed on surface work, such as roads, dams, and earthworks, and shall not be employed on any work hazardous to life or limb, such as machinery, nor go below the surface of the ground. The mining companies pay the Government 1s. 6d. a day, and provide quarters and water; there is a special visiting magistrate reporting direct to the Attorney-General. The Director of Prisons reports they are excellently housed, they receive the same food as in all the big prisons, and have the same working hours—that is, one hour less than under Cape Colony regulations.

Mr. WHITLEY: What is the nature of the offences for which these natives have been convicted? How does it come that there are so many native convicts?

*Mr. LYTTELTON: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Gentleman information, within a reasonable space of time, which would indicate the general nature of the offences committed.

Mr. WHITLEY: I want to know whether these are natives convicted for serious offences, or whether they have been convicted, for instance, for walking on the sidewalk instead of the middle of the road?

Mr. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): Is there any other portion of the King's dominions in which convicts are let out for hire?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Notice should be given of that Question.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL: Are all the native convicts at Johannesburg sent to work in the mines and none left in the prisons?

[No answer was returned.]

Education in the Transvaal.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been directed to the cost of administration in the Education Department in the Transvaal, which amounts to 12*s*. 6*d*. per child, as compared with 5*s*. per child in the Orange Colony, and 10*d*. in Cape Colony; and, if so, will he state what explanation the Colonial Office has for this expenditure, and what remedy does it propose for its reduction to a basis proportionate with the expenditure of the Educational Departments in the Orange Colony and Cape Colony.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: I am not aware on what the figures given in the Question are based and they do not appear to be correct.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman telegraph for information?

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Yes, Sir.

Korea.

Mr. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea District): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in view of the fact that the British and American mining concessions in Korea are situated north of the 39th parallel of latitude, and consequently within the area which Russia desires should be considered the neutral zone, whether, so far as British interests are concerned, that suggestion receives the approval of His Majesty's Government; and whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken, or will be taken, should necessity arise, to protect British interests in Korea, seeing that the United States have taken active measures for the protection of their interests in Korea.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl Percy, Kensington, S.): No suggestion for the creation of a neutral zone in Korea is before His Majesty's Government, and there is consequently no occasion for us to express any opinion on the subject. His Majesty's Minister at Seoul will afford to British interests and subjects all necessary assistance and protection. I am not aware of the measures which the hon. Member refers to as having been taken by the United States.

Niuchwang.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the interests of British trade, His Majesty's Government are taking steps with a view of securing an arrangement between the Powers for the neutralisation of the Chinese treaty port of Niuchwang during the Russo-Japanese war.

Earl PERCY: No, Sir. His Majesty's Government do not consider that it would be practicable to secure the neutralisation of any territory in the actual occupation of one of the belligerents.

Chinese Railways—British Bondholders' Interests.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that the net receipts of the Shan-hai-Kwan, Niuchwang, Hsin-min-tung Railway are allocated as security to British bondholders, His Majesty's Government have taken any steps for the purpose of safeguarding these lines and maintaining the present management and control.

Earl PERCY: The answer is in the negative. The Shan-hai-Kwan, Niuchwang, Hsin-min-tung Railway is a Chinese line and is protected by Chinese railway guards and troops.

Russia and Manchuria.

Mr. JOSEPH WALTON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the omission of the Russian Government in their declaration of the 8th January to renew their assurances as to their intention of evacuating Manchuria, His Majesty's Government have addressed any representations to the Russian Government on this point; and, if so, whether he can state to the House the reply received.

Earl PERCY: The hon. Member will find the information asked for at page 98 of the Blue-book which will be distributed to-day.

Chinese Labour in the Transvaal.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there are any treaties between Great Britain and China under which the assent of the Chinese Government would be necessary before the recruiting of labourers for the Transvaal could be initiated; and, if so, whether the Chinese Government have yet given their assent to such recruitment.

Earl PERCY: The recruitment of labourers in China is governed by the provisions of Article V. of the Treaty of Pekin. His Majesty's Government have been informed by the Chinese Minister that the draft Ordinance contains nothing which is likely to conflict with the proposals he may have to make when the time comes for negotiating the regulations provided for in this Article.

Transvaal Mines Recruits from British Central Africa.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has sanctioned the recruiting of 5,000 more natives in the British Central African Protectorate for the Transvaal mines; and under what terms is it proposed that they shall be recruited.

Earl PERCY: The answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. The conditions of recruitment are given in Africa No. 2, 1903, but it has been decided that recruiting shall in future be confined to the colder regions of the Central Africa Protectorate and that the arrival in the Transvaal of those who may enlist shall be postponed until August.

Colonial Insurances and Income Tax.

Mr. THORNTON (Clapham): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, as the provisions of the Income Tax Acts which authorise an allowance in respect of life insurance premiums do not include Colonial Government Insurances, he will consider the desirability of so amending these Statutes that Colonial Insurances may be put on the same footing as those issued in the United Kingdom.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Worcestershire, E.): As the hon. Member states, legislation is required in order to extend to Indian and Colonial Insurance Companies the exemption from income tax on premiums which is granted to Insurance Offices with head offices in the United Kingdom. I am making inquiries into the conditions under which Insurance companies carry on their business in the respective Colonies and in India, with a view to finding out whether in each case the same treatment is accorded to companies with local head offices and companies with head offices in the United Kingdom. Until I am in possession of the result of those inquires, I am unable to make any definite statement as to legislation.

Immature Whisky and Lunacy and Crime.

Mr. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the resolution adopted by the Portsmouth Town Council on the 8th instant; and whether, in view of the increase in lunacy and crime in England consequent on the consumption of immature potable spirits, he will consider the advisability of prohibiting the clearing from bond of whisky, rum, or brandy, until it has matured for three years.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: The subject referred to by the hon. Member was carefully considered by a Select Committee of this House in 1890. They reported that it was not desirable to pass any compulsory law in regard to age. Any attempt to deal with the subject by legislation would be a matter of much difficulty, and I am not prepared to make proposals such as the hon. Member suggests.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that such regulations have been made in Canada and other countries? What would be the difficulty in applying them to this country?

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I have no information on the point.

Departmental Administration.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the date of the appointment of the Inter-Departmental Committee to consider the duties, pay, and organisation of the Board of Trade, the Local Government Board, and other Departments, the names of the Committee, how many meetings the Committee have held, and when it is expected that the Committee will present their Report.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I must ask my hon. friend to refer to the answer which I gave to a similar Question put by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil on the 8th instant.† The Committee have held four meetings, and will sit again this week.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY. But is it not the fact that the Committee held only one meeting in six months, and can the right hon. Gentleman say why the Local Government Board took so long to supply the information asked for?

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: The Committee held a preliminary meeting and decided to get certain information from the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board, and the long delay before the holding of the meeting was due to the fact that they were awaiting the reply from the Local Government Board.

Fraudulent Spirits.

Mr. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that English spirit simply reduced, coloured, bottled, and labelled is every week being made up and sent out by itself, as Irish or Scotch whisky, according to the needs of the customer; that this takes place in the bonded warehouses in this country with the cognisance of the Excise officials, who are cautioned not to interfere; and that such so-called Scotch whisky is obtained from such materials as molasses, glucose, rice, and sugar, he will give instructions that such alcoholic drinks shall be properly described.

Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: The matter referred to is not one which can be adequately dealt with within the limits of an answer to a Question, but I may say that the objects desired by the hon. Member could not be obtained by the issue of instructions by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. KILBRIDE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Question is based on a letter in the Press signed by an Inland Revenue official?

† See page 580.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I have not seen the letter. An Inland Revenue officer has no right to communicate with the Press in regard to his official duties.

Compulsory Vaccination.

MR. CROOKS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will furnish the House with the total time lost and the cost incurred through the enforcement of vaccination in all the Government Departments in England.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY (Mr. VICTOR CAVENDISH, Derbyshire, W.): I regret that it is not possible to give this information without the expenditure of an amount of time and trouble which could hardly be justified by the result.

Firth of Forth Fisheries.

CAPTAIN ELLICE (St. Andrews Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to complaints made by the fishermen on the Fife coasts as to trawlers working inside the enclosed waters of the Firth of Forth and St. Andrews Bay; and, if so, whether he can make arrangements whereby the light-keepers on the Island of May might report to the police authorities any cases of illegal trawling which might come under their notice.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. SCOTT DICKSON, Glasgow, Bridgton): Since the beginning of 1903 the Fishery Board have received eight complaints from or on behalf of Fife fishermen regarding illegal trawling in the Firth of Forth and St. Andrews Bay. In the same period a number of detections were made by the Board's cruisers, and six convictions were obtained, while one case is pending. No arrangement exists for the keepers in the May Island lighthouse reporting cases of illegal trawling to the authorities, and there are grave objections to any arrangement which, in such a situation, could be of any practical benefit.

Legal Status of Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland what is the legal status of Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald under the Land Acts; and whether he is a Judge of the High Court of Justice, and entitled to rank as such.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): For the purposes of the Land Acts and Land Purchase Acts, Mr. Fitzgerald's status is that of a Judicial Commissioner, but he is not, in my opinion, a judge of the High Court of Justice, nor is he entitled to rank as such.

Dingle Railway.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps have yet been taken with a view to relieve the ratepayers of county Kerry of the burden which is caused by the Dingle Railway.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I have been conducting prolonged negotiations with the Directors of the Great Southern and Western Railway with a view to the transfer of this line to the system of that company. I regret to say that even now I have not reached a satisfactory conclusion. But I do not despair of reaching one.

Kerry Railway and Harbour Guarantees.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received resolutions from the various public boards in Kerry pointing out the burdens in the shape of railway and harbour guarantees which the county, half of which is congested, has to bear; whether he intends to do something to lessen this tax; and whether he could apply a portion of the money accumulating under Section 57 of the Local Government Act of 1898 for this purpose.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir, I have received a number of such resolutions. The reference at the end of the Question should be to Section 58, not 57, of the Act of 1898. I am not prepared to indicate the nature of legislative or other action which would be taken in the event of my coming to terms with the Great Southern and Western Railway.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the extent to which this burden falls on Kerry—several thousands a year?

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir, and we have long recognised the desirability of transferring these small lines to the great company.

Irish Land Court—Purchase of Insolvent Estates.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have as yet made any proposals to the Land Judge for the purchase of bankrupt estates in his Court; and if any effort is to be made to clear that Court of estates that are hopelessly insolvent.

MR. WYNDHAM: In pursuance of the provisions contained in Section 7 of the Act of last year, the Commissioners have taken steps with a view to the purchase of fourteen estates, for the sale of which absolute orders had been made in the Land Judge's Court.

Treatment of the Blind in Ireland.

MR. NANNETTI: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the intention of the Government to deal with the condition of the blind in Ireland during the present session, in accordance with the finding of the Royal Commission of 1889, which recommended special treatment for them.

MR. WYNDHAM: I cannot give a pledge to deal with this matter during the present session.

Land Purchase in County Armagh.

MR. JOHN CAMPBELL (Armagh, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Commissioners of Education in Ireland, who own several townlands near Loughgilly, county Armagh, have through their secretary declined to negotiate with their tenants for the sale of their estate save through their agent who demands twenty-seven and three-quarter years purchase; and, if so, whether he will take steps to induce the Commissioners of Education to sell to their tenants through the machinery of the Estates Commissioners.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Commissioners are quite willing, I am informed, to negotiate with the tenants. But as they are in the position of public trustees who are discharging their statutory trusts, the hon. Member must see that I have no power to suggest to them the mode in which the negotiations should be conducted.

MR. JOHN CAMPBELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the agent in all these cases is the notorious Mr. Johnson.

*MR. SPEAKER: That does not arise out of the Question.

Iveagh-Pirrie Motor-Car Service.

MR. JOHN CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can give any further information regarding the Iveagh-Pirrie motor-car service promised to be set up in Ireland.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir, I should be glad to do so if I obtain an opportunity more suited to a statement which must be lengthy if it is to be comprehensive. Perhaps the hon. Member will await the discussion of the Motion on the subject of transit rates standing in the name of the hon. Member for Cork for the 23rd instant, or put down an unstarred Question.

Land Purchase in County Galway.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the proposed scheme of division and sale of a grass farm in the parishes of Laurencetown and Killimer, county Galway, on the property of M. G. Comyn Kenny; whether he is aware that placards or circulars have been posted or distributed in the district announcing that the landlord is about to mark out the bounds as far as possible to suit the requirements of the people; that it is proposed to put up to competition the several divisions, a fine to be paid in each case preliminary to acceptance as tenant, and their sale to be affected under the Land Purchase Act of last year; and whether, seeing that it is stated in the placard or circular that the Estates Commissioners can advance sufficient money to the purchasers to build dwelling-houses and execute improvements on these projected buildings, he will state if a correspondence in connection with this proposed scheme has taken place between Mr. Kenny and the Estates Commissioners, and whether their sanction has been obtained.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Commisioners have no knowledge of the matters mentioned in the Question. No correspondence has taken place with them on the subject.

Arklow Harbour.

MR. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that for some years past complaints have been made by the Harbour Commissioners and the people of Arklow of the condition of the harbour, resulting in periodical closing up of it to marine traffic; and that for the past five months vessels have been unable either to enter or leave the harbour; and whether, seeing that the Harbour Commissioners represent d to the Board of Works and their engineer the urgency of the matter, and that the engineer finished his survey a month ago, he can state whether the engineer has yet reported to his Board; and, if so, whether the Government is prepared to do anything towards putting the harbour in a safe navigable condition so as to save to the town its existing industries.

MR. WYNDHAM: The Report of the Board of Work's Engineer has been made to that Department and will shortly be before me. In the meantime it may be desirable to point out that the liability for the maintenance of this harbour is vested in the Harbour Commissioners, not the Government.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: Why has the Report been so long delayed?

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Was not this defective work done by the Board of Works?

MR. WYNDHAM asked for notice of the Question.

Gault Estate, County Tyrone.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that the Master of the Rolls made in 1892 an absolute order for the sale of the Gault Estate, Trillick, county Tyrone, he can state what, after twelve years, is the position of the property, and if there is any prospect of the sale of the estate.

MR. WYNDHAM: An absolute Order for the sale of this estate was made by the Land Judge in 1896. No further steps appear to have been taken since that date; but I am informed that the solicitors having carriage of the sale have been required to attend before the Land Judge and account for the delay.

Bruff School Teacher.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Michael Quinlan, of Bruff, county Limerick, on 29th September last wrote to the Office of National Education, Ireland, asking for the extension of the evening school grant to Bruff, and was informed that the application would be referred to the inspector for report; that the school was opened on the following week, a committee being duly formed; that subsequently, as a result of the inspector's visit, aid was refused to the school on the alleged want of qualification on the part of the teacher, Mr. P. J. Casey, who conducts a school in the town with an average of forty pupils, teaching the various branches of English education; that in December, on a further application, a senior inspector was sent down, who also reported that aid could not be granted for the school, although the teacher was not examined and had made sixty two attendances out of the necessary seventy; and, if so, will he say in what way the teacher lacks the necessary qualifications, and arrange that the teacher shall be given the chance of an examination to prove his competency for the position.

MR. WYNDHAM: The inspector who reported on the first application declined to recommend a grant, and the senior inspector, to whom the second application was referred, also declined to recommend it. The qualifications of the teacher was only one of the considerations upon which the decision of the Commissioners was based. The matter is not one calling for the intervention of the Government.

Longford Land Commission.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when it is proposed to hold another sitting of the Head Land Commission in Longford for the hearing of appeals; and will he, with a view to effecting the payment of the March rents, direct them to hold a sitting before 20th March at latest.

MR. WYNDHAM: No date has yet been fixed; and I am informed by the Commissioners that it will not be possible for them to hold a sitting at Longford before the date mentioned. The delay will not be to the detriment of the parties affected, as the hon. Member will observe on referring to Section 3, Subsection 3, of the Land Law Act, 1896.

Irish Workhouse Inspectors.

MR. JOSEPH DEVLIN (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. O'Connor, the lately appointed inspector of the Local Government Board for Ireland, has any instructions over and above the instructions given to all the other inspectors with reference to his visits to workhouses in his district; and will he state on whose recommendation this gentleman, who was an auditor of the Local Government Board, was appointed, and how long he held the position before being promoted to inspectorship.

MR. WYNDHAM: The reply to the first part of the Question is in the negative. Mr. O'Connor held the position of auditor for three years before he was transferred to the Inspection Staff. It was upon the recommendation of the Vice-President of the Board, concurred in by me, that this gentleman, who had discharged with efficiency his duties as auditor, was selected for the office of inspector.

Galbraith Estate, Longford.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any overtures have been made to the Estates Commissioners for the purchase, as a congested estate, of the Galbraith Estate in the barony and county of Longford; and, if not, will he direct the Commissioners to consider the case of this estate with a view to purchase and resale to the tenants.

MR. WYNDHAM: No such overtures have been made. I shall be glad, however, to bring the suggestion of the hon. Member under the notice of the Estates Commissioners.

Irish Development Grant Fund.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any portion of the Ireland Development Grant Fund is available for drainage and the construction and repairing of bridges and byeroads leading into backward districts, the inhabitants of which have no road accommodation; and whether local public bodies in Ireland may make application for grants from that fund.

MR. WYNDHAM: Many applications have been made by local bodies for grants from this fund. The manner in which it is proposed to allocate it will appear in the Estimate to be laid before Parliament pursuant to the requirements of the Act of last year.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Will the representatives for Ireland be consulted before the Estimate is framed?

MR. WYNDHAM: I should be glad of an opportunity of doing so, but I rather think I have their views.

Limerick Gaol Doctor.

Mr. JOYCE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the services of Dr. John Holmes, Medical Officer to the Female Prison, Limerick, have been dispensed with; what number of years Dr. Holmes has been in charge of this prison; and what pension or compensation in lieu of pension, if any, has been offered to the doctor.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Dr. Holmes held the position of temporary medical officer of the female prison for thirteen years. His services were dispensed with upon the amalgamation of the medical officership of the male and female prisons. He was not entitled to a pension or compensation.

Mr. JOYCE: Will the right hon. Gentleman not consider this doctor's long term of service with a view of giving him some compensation?

Mr. WYNDHAM: I am afraid I cannot give an undertaking of that kind. It is, I am told, impossible to give a pension contrary to the statute.

Mr. JOYCE: I shall bring the matter up again.

Company Legislation.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury why he has not introduced legislation, as stated by him to the House of Commons on the 19th February, 1903, to meet cases of fraud similar to that of Whitaker Wright; and whether, having regard to the conviction of Whitaker Wright, under the provisions of the sections of the Criminal Law Consolidation Acts referred to by the Judge in passing sentence on him, he still proposes to introduce such legislation.

* The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's)—(for Mr. A. J. Balfour): The introduction of the Bill in question was postponed pending the recent trial. It is drafted, and will be introduced in a few days.

Whitaker Wright Trial Costs.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what steps, if any, do the Government intend to take to recoup the expenses sustained by the private prosecutors in the recent trial of Whitaker Wright; and whether there will be any public recognition of their services.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS (for Mr. A. J. Balfour): As was stated by the Attorney-General on the first day of the session the Government will defray the costs of the prosecution of Whitaker Wright.† I do not know what form of "public recognition" the hon. Gentleman has in his mind; but it is not proposed by the Government to promote a testimonial for the benefit of those who undertook the prosecution.

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: Will the costs to be repaid by the Government include the costs of the private gentleman who forced on the trial?

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I am afraid I cannot answer that Question offhand?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: I will put it down.

Russia and the Dardanelles.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury has the Russian Government approached His Majesty's Government with a request or suggestion that they should consent to Russian men-of-war passing from the Black Sea through the Bosphorus and Dardanelles; in view of the fact that such a passage would be a violation of European treaties, what attitude will His Majesty's Government take on this point; and can any Papers be laid.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS (for Mr. A. J. Balfour): His Majesty's Government have not been approached with any such request or suggestion. There is no reason whatever for supposing that the Russian Government contemplate a step which would involve a distinct violation of their treaty obligations to the European Powers.

CHINESE LABOUR FOR THE TRANSVAAL.

Sir CHARLES McLAREN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when an opportunity will be given to the House of expressing an opinion on Chinese labour in the Transvaal Colony.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS (for Mr. A. J. BALFOUR): The hon. Member asks me whether any opportunity, other than the Address, will be given for the discussion of the question of Chinese labour in the Transvaal Colony. I regret that I cannot offer any other day. An opportunity occurs on the Address, and if that opportunity is not taken, seeing the length to which the debate has extended and the amount of financial business which has to be taken before Easter, I am afraid I cannot afford, out of Government time, any other opportunity.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I understand that the right hon. Gentleman adheres to the idea, which has always possessed the Government, that the Amendment on the Address will be a sufficient and seasonable opportunity of discussing this matter, notwithstanding that the undertaking of the Secretary for the Colonies was that the Government would give an opportunity for that discussion. I think that all one can do now is to say that, considering the information which is still withheld from us—I do not say unreasonably withheld, but still not in our possession—in regard to the regulations for enforcing the labour, and other matters, I hope it will be understood that, when these pieces of information now lacking are in our hands, and when the Government have taken action in the matter, it will be open to us, if we see fit, to move a vote of censure.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I understood that my right hon. friend had only given an assurance that an opportunity would be given to the House of expressing its opinion upon this question before the Ordinance was approved. I understand that the opportunity has been taken by an hon. Member opposite of raising the question on the Address. I am afraid I must confirm the answer I have given. Of course it is in the right of the Leader of the Opposition or any other Member on that Bench to claim a day for a vote of censure, which, of course, the Government will give at once.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Can the right hon. Gentleman not consider the advisability of postponing the final decision of this matter until the views in detail upon the subject held by Australia and New Zealand are laid before Members of the House? There is a strong feeling in Australia and New Zealand, and we are not in full possession of it.

[No answer was returned.]

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Wait till Dick Seddon comes home again.

The Fiscal Debate.

MR. CHARLES McARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): May I ask the Home Secretary, as representing the Leader of the House, whether he is aware that a large number of Members who have risen to speak on the Amendment to the Address now before the House have been accorded no opportunity of expressing their opinion (OPPOSITION cheers), and that, in particular, no representatives of the principal commercial or shipping centres, Glasgow, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, or the City of London (cries of "Bradford" and laughter), have yet taken part in the debate, excepting two members of the Government, who represent Divisions of Glasgow and Leeds respectively; and whether, having regard to the great importance of the fiscal question to the mercantile and shipping interests, he will extend the period allotted to the debate in order that reasonable facilities may be given?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I quite sympathise with the desire of many hon. Gentlemen to take part in this debate, but I do honestly think that it has been extended quite a sufficiently long time. Considering the amount of time at the disposal of the Government before the financial year closes, and as representing the Leader of the House, I have to take care that the House is not brought to a deadlock. (Ironical cheers.) Hon. Gentlemen opposite may cheer, but I venture to point out to them that, Leader as I am temporarily—very unworthily (cries of "No")—I have taken unusual care in this debate to secure the convenience of private Members, and, with the consent of the Front Bench opposite, given to my right hon. friend the Member for Leeds, it was arranged that as few Members of the two Front Benches as possible should take part in the debate. In these circumstances I cannot make any departure from an honourable understanding which has been come to between the two Front Benches.

[Bill 61.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (KING'S SPEECH, MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Ordered, That the Proceedings on the King's Speech (Motion for an Address), if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order (Sittings of the House). (Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.)

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

(TENTH DAY.)

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

Which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words, 'But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvment are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being.'"—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

*SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said that in one respect he enjoyed an advantage in regard to the subject matter of this debate, and that was that there was no one in his constituency who had the smallest doubt as to his opinions upon this matter. To avoid any misconception as to the views he had expressed during the twenty years he had been a Member of the House, he ventured to claim for a short time the indulgence of the House. There was nothing new in the fiscal campaign in which they were now engaged, and he had long felt that this question would ultimately be taken up by a statesman of the first rank and the greatest ability, like the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Nearly a quarter of a century ago he had opportunities of seeing the terrible destitution and misery amongst the great mass of working classes in the East End of London and other great cities. From the seats under the gallery to which he had access he heard Mr. Wheelhouse in 1880 move for a Committee.

"To consider the commercial relations at present existing between England and foreign nations, especially with regard to the import of manufactured goods from abroad, as well as the effect caused by our system of one-sided so called free trade with a view, if possible, of ameliorating the condition of the wage-earning classes of this country."

Mr. Gladstone's Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget Speech in 1881, said—

"I wish Parliament to understand that we are not making ground at present, I speak of the last few years and without reference to Party differences I say we are rather losing than making ground."

As the late Sir Stafford Northcote pointed out, this decline began in the year 1872. Then came Mr. Gladstone's failure to make a treaty with Republican France. A year passed and then came forward the real originator of the fair trade movement in this House. Hon. Members might think he referred to his right hon. friend the Member for Thanet, to Mr. Farrer Ecroyd, then Member for Preston, to the veteran Mr. Cunliffe Lester, now Lord Masham, or to his right hon. friend the Member for Sleaford. Not at all. He referred to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was he who by his extraordinary recantation, last year, of his previous opinions and his refusal to let colonial wheat free into the United Kingdom, was the cause of all this turmoil. If he were to read his speech of 24th March, 1882, making the necessary alterations in the figures, to bring them up to date, it would be the best argument against the Motion of the Member for Montrose. On 24th March, 1882, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon, then representing the Tower Hamlets, moved unsuccessfully—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the effects which the tariffs in force in foreign countries have upon the principal branches of British trade and commerce and into the possibility of removing by legislation or otherwise any impediment to the fullest development of the manufacturing and commercial industry of the United Kingdom."

The right hon. Gentleman called attention to the increase of pauperism, to the increase of emigration, and said—

"The fact was that the country was going back and that retrogression had been attributed by large numbers of the people to the commercial policy of the country, and the want of confidence which it had engendered, and which had not been diminished by the total failure of Mr. Gladstone's Government in the previous year, in the negotiations for a treaty of commerce with the French Republic. He felt certain that we could successfully compete with all the world if our manufacturers could secure a fair field and no favour. He denied that our progress was mainly attributable to our commercial policy. If the exports to foreign countries were separated from the exports to British possessions the diminution in the exports to foreign countries was very remarkable. Instead of decreasing 30 per cent. like our foreign trade, they increased in 1880 to £75,000,000 or 25 per cent. That increase would have been still greater if it had not been for a decrease of about 20 per cent. in our exports to Canada and 25 per cent in our exports to Victoria, which was an evidence of the effect of their tariff. Nothing could show more forcibly the immense value to us, as outlets for our manufactures, of our colonies and the great importance of doing all in our power to draw them closer to us."

There was nothing, said the right hon. Gentleman—

"Against the principles of free trade in retaliation, but there was, above all, the question of drawing closer together the bonds which united us with our colonies. If that were feasible he was sure it would meet with the assent and support of all classes in the country and of hon. Members on both sides of the House."

What a change in the right hon. Gentleman. It is he who proposed this resolution who had turned round and become the great opponent. The Motion was strongly supported by the late Sir Stafford Northcote, and my friend, then Member for Preston, Mr. Farrer Ecroyd speaking for the North of England. But it was defeated by Mr. Gladstone's Government by a majority of fifty-one. The movement, however, went on under the auspices of the Fair Trade League and encouraged by the Imperial Federation League, presided over by Lord Rosebery, and founded by that great patriot and Liberal, the late right hon. W. E. Forster, who said to the hon. Sir Charles Tupper, High Commissioner for Canada—

"I am a free-trader, but I am not so fanatical a free-trader that I should not be perfectly willing to adopt the policy of fiscal arrangements by which the outlying portions of the Empire would be treated by the mother country on a different footing to foreign countries, for the great and important object of binding this great Empire together."

In 1885, he the speaker, was returned to this House, and had been four times subsequently, by Central Sheffield, to further this policy by all means in his power. Unfortunately, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon was allured to the Treasury Bench and straightway dropped his previous convictions—for he was sure in 1882 he was sincere—but the movement went on. In 1887 the National Union of Conservative Associations at Oxford passed at his instance a resolution by 1,000 to 12 declaring—

Sir Howard Vincent.

"That the continued depression in trade and agriculture, the increase in the scarcity of employment and the consequent distress among all classes, render reform in the policy of the United Kingdom as regards foreign imports and the influx of foreigners a matter of vital necessity to the people of Great Britain and Ireland."

Twelve times the Conference of the National Union had after full notice and deliberation endorsed that resolution and urged the Government to carry out to the full the views enunciated by the Colonial Conferences of 1887, 1897, and 1902 on the subject of preferential trade between all parts of the British Empire. The Prime Minister and his right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham had only, therefore, tardily voiced the earnest wishes through many years of the great majority of the Conservative and Unionist Party throughout the country. It became of importance, therefore, to consider what was the attitude of the late Lord Salisbury, four times Prime Minister in the past twenty years, and for all time a beacon light in the annals of the Unionist Party. There had lately been some correspondence in regard to the late Lord Salisbury's view of this question. He had the advantage of having been in frequent communication with Lord Salisbury on this matter during the last twenty years, and he honestly believed that his Lordship shared in the main the principles which were now advocated by the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Perhaps the House would allow him to quote one or two expressions of opinion, and to refer to some of the Acts that tended to confirm this view. On 10th November, 1890, Lord Salisbury said in the City of London,—

"We know that every bit of the world's surface which is not under the British Flag is a country which may be, and probably will be, closed to us by a hostile tariff. It is to the trade that is carried on within the Empire that we look for the vital force of the commerce of this country."

On 12th February, 1891, Lord Salisbury said—

"Whenever such a modification of English opinion takes place, so that the idea of discrimination of duties in favour of colonial produce shall be a fiscal possibility, I shall not oppose the wish to have the matter thoroughly discussed between ourselves and the Colonies."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet would remember heading a deputation that waited on Lord Salisbury on 19th June, 1891, with regard to the treaties which had been negotiated between 1862 and 1865. What was Lord Salisbury's answer to his right hon. friend and the representatives from all parts of the country who accompanied him? He said—

> "Those who believe, as you believe, that you are the representatives of a rising movement in possession of a policy which only requires to be explained to your countrymen to be adopted by them, your duty is plain—spare no pains in the effort of impressing it upon your fellow men, you are invited to go forth and fight for it."

That injunction was obeyed, and the United Empire Trade League was formed. Under its auspices meetings were held in all parts of the country, and in the large towns throughout the Empire. In 1897 they won their first rampart. After six years hard work on the part of the League, Lord Salisbury, as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, denounced the Gladstone treaties forbidding the Colonies putting lighter duties on British goods than upon foreign goods, and gave a year's notice to terminate them in order to enable the Colonies, if they wished, to treat British goods more favourably than foreign goods. On 1st August, 1898, the notices expired, and from midnight one-fourth of the Canadian duty was remitted upon—

> "Articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain and Ireland, of India, or any British colony, or upon goods in which at least 25 per cent. of the value was British labour."

He could quote, if time allowed, numerous other expressions from the public speeches of Lord Salisbury in this connection such as—

> "Under the present conditions of our tariff no one cares two straws about the commercial favour of England,"

And that—

> "We are fighting with our hands tied against armed men."

The long and short of it was that he was so convinced of the sympathy of the late Lord Salisbury with this movement, that, with the concurrence of his hon. friends who acted with him, he invited his Lordship, after resigning the office of Prime Minister, to become president of the United Empire Trade League. Lord Salisbury, who was usually very prompt in his replies, took a month to consider the invitation, and his answer was nearly the last holograph letter he wrote. In that letter he said—

> "At this moment so many diverse questions are at issue that I should feel unwilling to accept the presidency you kindly offer me. I might find it difficult to express myself so as to avoid misconception. We do not yet precisely know the form which the discussion will take in our own ranks."

The House would see there was no refusal, only a desire to avoid any disagreement in the Unionist Party.

He would now ask the House to consider the present state of trade and employment, and to consider how much worse was the state of affairs since 1882—that was since this matter was brought before the House by his right hon. friend the Member for Croydon, then a private Member. He would ask hon. Members to consider the facts and to say whether they did not call for a remedy. There were many hon. Gentlemen opposite who not only in private but in public thought with the tariff reformers in this matter. [Cries of "Name."] Mr. Storey, President of the Liberal Federation. It was all very well for hon. Gentlemen to laugh at that name, but Mr. Storey had rendered yeoman service to the Liberal Party as President of the Liberal Federation. But that was the way the Liberal Party treated their old friends. The President of the Liberal Association of the Elland Division took exactly the same view. Another instance was that of Mr. Thomas Brassey, son of Lord Brassey. [Laughter.] They laughed at him, but they adopted him as a candidate. They spoke very highly of him at Devonport and elsewhere. They would find plenty of instances in constituencies represented by Liberals of men who were in favour of tariff reform. He was extremely anxious not to raise any controversial questions, and therefore he would not refer Liberals to old friends who had left them on this question.

If they would look at the matter dispassionately, they would see that the state of affairs during the last twenty-four years had become much worse.

The Board of Trade Blue-books showed that in the ten years, 1891 to 1900, the imports for consumption increased by £534,000,000, and the exports by only £55,000,000. There was an average yearly excess of £145,000,000 in foreign imports over our exports. Comparing the first ten years with the last, our exports of cotton manufactures fell by £60,000,000; our exports of iron and steel fell by £29,000,000; our exports of woollen and worsted manufactures fell by £23,000,000; of hardware and cutlery by £11,000,000; and of linen manufactures, leather manufactures, steam engines, copper and jute manufactures, over £12,000,000—a total fall of £137,000,000 in manufactured exports. Against that we could only set a rise of £34,000,000 in the exports of machinery other than steam engines; of £5,000,000 in apparel and slops; and of £10,000,000 in chemical products. Were we to submit to this loss of £87,000,000 in our exports of manufactured goods, coupled with a rise in twenty years in the import of foreign manufactured goods of £100,000,000, without inquiry or effort to remedy a state of things so disastrous to the producers of this country? Our exports to France fell in the ten years 1891 to 1900 compared to the previous ten years by £8,000,000; to the United States by £63,000,000; to Italy by £7,000,000. Our exports to some countries, it was true, rose, but while the imports from all sources into all foreign countries was increased by 11 per cent., our export trade to all foreign countries only increased by 4 per cent.; and Return 363 of 1898 shows that each £100 of English foreign trade in 1854 became in 1897 £253 19s. 9d., while each £100 of the foreign trade in 1854 of the twelve principal foreign nations under protection became £454 3s. 5d., or nearly double our progress. On 24th March, 1882, the President of the Board of Trade declared that "our imports of manufactures and half manufactures are only £35,000,000." Last year, 1903, the Trade and Navigation Returns for December showed that they were £134,659,090, or close on £135,000,000. This gain of £100,000,000 sterling of foreign manufacturers in our home market in twenty years was surely enough to make any man reconsider the position, and especially as 10,000,000 more pairs of hands had been added to our population, they had lost the £60,000,000 which had been paid in wages to the foreign workman.

Now what had been the result of this state of affairs as regard the employment of the masses. The Labour Gazette for January showed that 37,500 trades unionists were out of employment, that 3,000,000 workpeople sustained decreases in wages in the last three years, that on a single day last December 370,469 were dependent on poor law relief, and that 261,363 English, Scotch and Irish, in despair of obtaining a living at home, had to emigrate mostly to protected countries, and give place to 80,000 aliens. He would bring the matter nearer home to his own constituency. Nearly every trade was falling. This was what the Sheffield Telegraph of that morning said—

> "The claims on the fund for the relief of the distress in Sheffield are still very pressing, and in order to provide one meal a day for the penniless unemployed and their families further help is urgently required."

They received only that morning from the Duke of Norfolk, on the occasion of his marriage, a contribution of £1,000, which was only another testimony of his Grace's great kindness to the people of Sheffield. The hon. Baronet the Member for Hallamshire, who generally sat opposite, and whose absence he was afraid was due to illness, said at a meeting in the Sheffield Town Hall on 9th February, that—

> "He was afraid the present depressed state of trade would continue for some time, and that there would be no great improvement in business for a considerable period."

This was a most lamentable state of affairs; and, if his view was not the right one, do let them have from hon. Members opposite some remedy. He did not see the hon. Member for Carnarvon Boroughs, but he was sitting behind the Member for Forest of Dean when that right hon. Baronet said that this prosperity argument had been pushed much too far. The other day when he was banqueted by his friends at the New Reform Club. He said—

> "Mr. Chamberlain was right in so far as he said things were not well in this country. They could not feed the hungry with statistics of national prosperity, and stop the pangs of famine by reciting to a man the prodigious number of cheques that had passed through the clearing-house. They had, therefore, got to propose something better than Mr. Chamberlain. They ought to do something to help the poor from the mire and the needy from the dunghill."

And Mr. Pickersgill, who was formerly Radical Member for Bethnal Green, on another occasion said—

"We must meet Mr. Chamberlain with a policy at least as attractive as his own. It must be a bread-and-butter policy."

During the ast five days debate there had been a score of very interesting and eloquent speeches from hon. Gentlemen opposite, but so far as he heard, and he had listened to nearly everything that had been said, not one single word of suggestion had been offered to remedy this condition of affairs. He had heard a great deal of abuse of the Prime Minister and of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham and those who had been acting under him, but if hon. Gentlemen opposite had a remedy, for goodness sake let the House and the country know what it was. He could promise for himself, and in behalf of everyone on that side of the House, that if they had a remedy for this unfortunate condition of things it would be impartially and thoroughly considered. But if they had no remedy, let them, at all events, give a fair consideration to the remedy which he and his friends suggested. That remedy was to do something to break down the tariff walls opposed to our trade, something to give confidence to labour-employing capital, to prevent British factories being removed to protected countries, to people and develop the Empire, and—that is to trade with those who trade with us, to develop trade within the Empire on mutually advantageous terms and on a preferential basis.

He regretted the depreciatory tone in which some hon. Members had spoken in regard to the great patriotic action of the Dominion of Canada. He referred to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Forest of Dean. It was lamentable that the latter hon. Gentleman had upbraided and scoffed at the Canadian Government, which had endeavoured to give a preference to British trade. Let him quote from The Times of that morning the advantage which British trade had received from Canada—

"In 1897 the exports of British and Irish produce to the North American colonies had fallen to £5,476,161 from £8,141,586 in 1889. They immediately rose in 1898 to £6,154,773, and in 1900 to £8,126,710. Then the Canadian Government increased the preference from 25 per cent. to 33⅓ per cent., and in 1902 the value of the British exports to Canada amounted to £10,720,325, or very nearly double what it was in 1897. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that the improvement in 1903 is continued in almost every line. To take only a few instances, the Canadian purchase of British hardware increased from 4,003 cwt. in 1901 to 8,566 cwt. in 1903, and of galvanised sheets from 7,418 tons in 1901 to 10,900 tons in 1903. The importation of British piece goods also rose from 36,000,000 yards in 1901 to 47,000,000 yards in 1903, and that of British woollen tissues from 3,900,000 yards in 1901 to 5,225,000 yards in 1903."

Again, last year, South Africa, under the auspices of the late Colonial Secretary, gave British imports a preference of 25 per cent. and the result has been that many orders have come to this country which would otherwise have gone to the fierce and state-aided competition of the United States, Belgium, and Germany. The Report of Mr. Birchenough, the Special Commissioner of the Board of Trade, holds out hopes of orders for £100,000,000 worth of goods in the next ten years. And then there had been the action of New Zealand under the ægis of Mr. Seddon. In proposing the Preferential and Reciprocal Trade Bill that great Imperial Statesman said—

"In the Bill we are making no distinction. Canada, Australia, India, wherever British rule prevails, all parts of the Empire are treated alike, and a British Zollverein with the passing of this Bill commences so far as New Zealand is concerned, and the increased duties are chargeable only as against alien countries who have fiscal barriers against us. I claim it to be our duty to alter our customs in favour of the mother country."

and by more than a three to one majority the representatives of our brothers in New Zealand passed the Bill. And were we to sit still and do nothing while our kith and kin conferred these benefits upon us? But for the British possessions, which took last year £109,000,000 of our exports—a rise of £25,000,000 in fifteen years—we should be in a bad way. In 1869, as every one knows, the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean wrote a book entitled "Greater Britain." There were many passages in it which he thought the right hon. Baronet must now greatly regret. He saw and wrote as a Radical in the anti-colonial Radical days of thirty-five or forty years ago. For instance on page 398 of the 3rd edition the right hon. Baronet said—

> "With the more enlightened thinkers of England separation from the Colonies has for many years been a favourite idea."

That was in entire accord with Mr. Cobden's view. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Montrose Burghs said the other day, what was perfectly true, that he was better acquainted with the "Life of Cobden" than he himself was. But on page 231 of the right hon. Gentleman's "Life of Cobden," Cobden's views regarding the Colonies were given in a very notable letter to Mr. Ashworth. He wrote—

> "The colonial system with all its dazzling appeals to the passions of the people can never be got rid of except by the indirect process of free trade, which will gradually and imperceptibly loose the bonds which unite our colonies to us by a mistaken notion of self-interest."

That view might still be entertained by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but it was not the view which was entertained by any hon. Gentleman on those Benches or by their supporters in the country. Their desire was to do all they possibly could to draw the Colonies closer to the mother country and to recognise the magnificent services they had rendered to the Empire in recent years. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Forest of Dean was one of the most enlightened thinkers in England, and he would invite the attention of the House to a passage from the right hon. Gentleman's book "Greater Britain." On page 331 he wrote—

> "It would seem as though we free-traders had become nearly as bigoted in favour of free trade as our former opponents were in favour of protection . . . . Protection is no mere national delusion; it is a system deliberately adopted with open eyes as one conducive to the country's welfare."

Let them then deal with the matter not as bigots or fanatics on one side or the other but let them look at it as business men from a business point of view. The conclusion which he ventured to offer was that the best way to develop a business was to develop it on the lines which appeared most promising. The export trade between the Colonies and the mother country showed a return of £3 per head. It was surely better to develop trade in that direction than to endeavour to develop trade with foreign countries which only gave a return of a few shillings per head. The Duke of Devonshire was sometimes thought to be opposed to them in this matter; but he happened to have a prospectus of the British Empire League, of which the Duke was chairman, and of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Berwick Division, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Poplar, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Haddingtonshire, were vice-presidents. The objects of the League were stated to be as follows—

> "To promote trade between the United Kingdom and the Colonies and India, and to consider how far it may be possible to modify any laws or treaties which impede freedom of action in the making of reciprocal trade arrangements between the United Kingdom and the Colonies, or between any two or more British colonies and possessions."

They were therefore all agreed, and what was the use in wrangling about details. Let the matter be argued without Party spirit, and let them do their best to devise the quickest remedy. Surely the Prime Minister was right when he said that the first step was to regain liberty of negotiation. The Prime Minister said—

> "It cannot be right for the country with free-trade ideals to enter into competition with protectionist rivals, self-deprived of the only instrument by which their policy can conceivably be modified. The only alternative is to do to foreign nations what they always do to each other, and instead of appealing to economic theories in which they wholly disbelieve, to use fiscal inducements which they thoroughly understand."

He appealed to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and also to his hon. friends who did not agree as to the details of the proposals now before the country, to follow the example of those who, although they might not have agreed with everything which had been stated from the Treasury Bench for twenty years, had always supported the Government to the utmost of their power for the sake of the great national issues which were involved. He appealed to his hon. friends, in this very serious crisis of the world's history, not to divide the Party, and not to support a Motion which was designed not so much with reference to the fiscal question, but in order to create confusion in the ranks of the Unionist Party. His hon. friend the Member for Exeter asked a question the other day which he would take the liberty of answering. His hon. friend wished to know to what port the ship in which he was serving was bound. It was bound to the port of National Prosperity through the channels of constant Employment and Good Wages. They had confidence in their captain the Prime Minister, and they had confidence in their pilot the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. If his hon. friend and others of his hon. friends would vote straight for the Party in accordance with the wishes of their constituencies they need not have the slightest fear that they would be left derelict at the next general election. His sporting friend the Member for South-east Durham was also anxious for an answer to a question he put. He would tell his hon. friend that the horse they were running was the old horse which had been so unaccountably sold by his right hon. friend the Member for Croydon. It was the people's favourite, and was bound to win, although it might be hustled by jockeys whose licences had been withdrawn by the electors of England.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said he congratulated his hon. friend on the day of his triumph. His hon. friend could scarcely have expected to see the day when he would hear a highly protectionist speech delivered by him, cheered from the Treasury Bench, not ironically, nor could he expect that he should occupy the proud position of answering for a Government which appeared incapable of answering for itself. The debate had been cheered and enlivened by the concatenation of quotations and figures which had been given by his hon. friend. But even before his hon. friend spoke the debate was one which was not unworthy of this House. They all indeed much regretted the absence of the Prime Minister, and he himself regretted that the debate had not taken place on a substantive Motion but on an Amendment to the Address. Nevertheless, in spite of the absence of the Prime Minister, the debate had been most illuminating and most sensational. The absence of the Prime Minister had deprived the House of an opportunity which sooner or later during the session must be given to it. Five Ministers had resigned and practically a new Ministry now ornamented the Treasury Bench. The concatenation of events by which that result had been achieved must have been of one of two characters. It must either have been characterised by falsehood, treachery, nepotism and jobbery; or Ministers must have left the Government on account of principle and must have left a chief who had treated them with full and frank confidence and to whom they owed the same confidence. They must in that case have left the Government to their own regret and to the equal regret of the Prime Minister; and his right hon. friend must have filled up their places with a sole eye to the efficiency of the Government. He did not know which of those two accounts was correct nor could any man tell in the absence of the Prime Minister. In his absence a very serious doubt hung over those events and sooner or later answers to the questions raised by the resignations by ex-Ministers must be given and the doubt removed. The debate showed that nobody agreed with the Government. The protectionists did not agree with it because it did not go far enough, but they were most nearly agreed with it. Free traders did not agree with it because it, went too far. The Government did not agree with itself, but it was most nearly agreed on protection and he need scarcely add that that state of affairs caused most profound disappointment among those who were inelegantly known as free-fooders and who, in fact, did attach the greatest importance to the retention in this country of cheap and abundant food.

They expected, after the declaration of the Prime Minister at Sheffield, that this debate would be signalised by a complete and full renunciation by the Government of the errors of Birmingham. He thought they had a right to expect that, because to some extent the Sheffield declaration was ambiguous and he had confidently hoped that this ambiguity would be now finally cleared up.

This expectation was confirmed by the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, after hearing which he had come to the conclusion that His Majesty's Government had at last come down on the right side, and he then determined, as had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol, that he could not vote for the Amendment. But how the scene had now changed! The Secretary to the Board of Trade had spoken! The Secretary of State for the Colonies had spoken and disclosed quite a different attitude from that disclosed by the President of the Board of Trade. So had the President of the Local Government Board, and while the President of the Board of Trade had begun by declaring for free trade, these other three members of the Government had declared for protection and food taxing. This was what had so unexpectedly placed the free-fooders in antagonism to the Government. It would be hard for a conscientious Member to vote against the Amendment, because it was gospel truth. Every proposition it contained was undeniable, and the Amendment need not necessarily be considered a vote of want of confidence by the Government. It would have been a vote of want of confidence at the time when the Address in reply to the Speech was a recapitulation of the Speech paragraph by paragraph. Then if a paragraph were amended the whole tenour of the reply was changed But this Address was no more than a expression of thanks, and the addition of a further proposition to it was not a vote of want of confidence in the Government, unless the Government were prepared to deny the truth of the proposition. But even if it be a vote of want of confidence, there were things even more important than the fate of Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench. It was of more importance that the country should have free food than that it should retain the present occupants on the Treasury Bench. On the road leading to the taxation of food he for one would never go, whoever led. And who was leading in that direction? On what road was the Government walking, and to what did it all tend? What the issue before the country would be at the general election he did not know, but the issue now before the House was whether trade should be bond or free whether food should be dear or cheap, whether trade should be left to be conducted by men of business or be taken under the protection of a tariff-loving Government.

It was said that only men of business were competent to deal with the question. How many men of business were there in the Government? Except Lord Londonderry, who earned a precarious livelihood by selling coals, and who, by the way, was a free-trader, there was not on the Treasury Bench a single Minister who had so much as managed an apple stall or undersold a competitor to his destruction. Not one of them even thought himself a man of business except the Colonial Secretary, who supposed himself capable of earning £100 a year as a working man. Of the merits of free trade, protection, and preference he would say little, for they had been well nigh exhausted, but he would say that this country drew from the uttermost ends of the earth all that contributed to the wants of man; to his comforts and his necessities. And it kept them, for year by year it kept more of all commodities, including even gold and silver than it sent away. That had been going on for fifty years. For fifty years we had been accumulating in this way all that man can desire, and we might say in the beautiful words of the psalm—

> "Our garners are full, affording all manner of store. There is no complaining in our streets; happy is that people that is in such a case."

That condition of things represented plenty, wealth, and prosperity; yet the apostles of scarcity complained and declared that the contrary was the case. Might he not add, in the words of the psalmist—

> "Rid me and deliver me from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood."

The apostles of scarcity asked the country to believe that a full garner meant impending ruin, that the possession of all that men could pray for or want was the sign of poverty and disaster, that the nation was the loser when we sent out less than we received, better off if we sent out more than we received, and at its best if we sent out all and received nothing. They declared that if we must put up with the curse of imports it were better to take that curse from our cousins, whom it was our object to bind to us with links of affection. They called themselves protectionists and preferentialists, which meant much the same thing. By the protectionists we were asked to protect ourselves against the world to the ruin of our customers; by the preferentialists we were asked to prefer the Colonies to the rest of the world to our own ruin. It had been said, and it might, be that protection had succeeded in other countries, but this country was in such a position in the midst of the sea, at the crossing of all the sea roads of the world, as to be different from every other; nor was the example of any other country applicable to it. Our destiny was marked out as the carriers of the world, and our island as best fitted to be the one great, perpetual free port through which the trade movements of the world should take place. Since 1846 this country had been, on the whole, the freest market and freest exchange ever known in history. Protection and preference had been tried, protection was given up in 1846 and preference in 1860; they were both given up because both had been recognised to be a complete failure. Protection failed even for agriculture. In the years 1821, 1833, and 1836, when the corn duties were in force, people flocked from this country to testify to Committees of this House that agriculture was insolvent. A great agricultural expert, Mr. Bernard, in 1836 was asked—

> "Do you believe it possible that farmers can go on at this rate? No, I consider the whole agricultural body is insolvent. On your conscience do you believe that to be true? I do, and consequently my belief is that the whole agricultural body, including all noblemen as well as farmers, is insolvent."

That was in 1836, when we had a high protective tariff, and he was therefore justified in saying that the protective system was a failure. But if it failed for the landlord and the farmer, it failed worse for the poor. In 1801 wheat in this country was 120*s*. a quarter, which was 15s. a bushel. In that year the weekly wage of the Hertfordshire labourer —and he had not forgotten it—was 8s. In 1902 wheat was 28s. 1d. per quarter, or 3s. 6d. a bushel, while the Hertfordshire labourer's wages were 14s. 7d., and the labourer could therefore buy to-day four bushels of wheat instead of half a bushel a century ago. That was the condition of things to or towards which the protectionists would have the country return. The great missionary of scarcity had been going about the country preaching a return to a system of this kind. With false dates and falsified figures, he had drawn false pictures and had gone whining and whimpering of impending ruin in order to lure us back to the reconstruction of a false fabric which had starvation at the base and insolvency at the summit. The right hon. Gentleman had changed his mind often, but he had adopted frank protection by his so-called Scientific Budget and by that crowning travesty of a Royal Commission which would never have entered the mind of any one but a statesman who had been received in a civic hall to the strains of "God save the King." The right hon. Gentleman had now temporarily put off the ermine, and, presumably in order to avoid guards of honour and Royal salutes, he had gone, so the newspapers said, under the incognito of "Mr. Richards," to Egypt where from the summit of the Pyramids forty centuries would contemplate him with some curiosity. [Continued cries of "Oh."] There seemed to be present the neophytes of some new religion who could not bear to hear criticised a person whom they regarded almost as divine. When the right hon. Gentleman reached Egypt and learnt what had occurred in Hertfordshire to his well-beloved and trusty commissioner he would probably revise his opinion and begin to doubt whether so much success was assured to his plan as he had formerly supposed.

So far as the Government was concerned, there had been a series of manifestoes from the First Lord of the Treasury. In his Sheffield speech he affirmed retaliation, but retaliation which was so limited as not to impose a tax on food or raw material, which was not to involve a high and a low tariff system, which was not to lead to a tariff war, and which was only to be carried into effect with the consent of Parliament. To such retaliation no man, free-trader or free-fooder, could have the slightest objection. The rest of the Sheffield speech was a declaration against the taxation of food—and that speech, on the whole, was entirely incompatible and inconsistent with, and contrary to, the Birmingham plan. Since then, further light had been afforded. In October, a most interesting pamphlet, containing the Sheffield speech and other declarations of the Prime Minister, was issued. That pamphlet was preceded by an introduction, which had since been suppressed and withdrawn, and consequently was the more interesting at the present moment. In that introduction the following passages occurred—

> "The Government is agreed as to the proposals which, as a practical policy, are to be put before the electorate at the next general election, i.e., fiscal reform is necessary, and carries with it the liberty, if the threat be unheeded, to effect retaliation. Neither the taxation of food, nor any bolstering up of a home industry, which is failing through natural and legitimate competition, is included in the programme."

That was the official introduction to the official version of the Prime Minister's speech. These words followed—

> ". . . the chief Liberal attack is bound to be directed against those points which are now debatable amongst ourselves. Such attack is fair and to be expected. It can only succeed if we exhibit weakness and folly."

That introduction fully reaffirmed and put the dots on the i's of the Sheffield speech—but it was withdrawn. Why? Who could doubt that it was at the bidding of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham? Then came a change. There was the Bristol speech, in which the Prime Minister said there were to be profound modifications of our fiscal system, and called free-traders "our opponents." Finally, in December last, there appeared at Dulwich a candidate who entirely shared the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who had even given £1,000 to the Tariff Reform League, and who yet received from the Prime Minister a letter with best wishes for his success. Thus the Prime Minister, who since his Sheffield speech had been expected to resist, had seemed rather drawing nearer and nearer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. They must therefore ask was the Prime Minister for protection or for free trade, or did he aspire to found a matrimonial agency destined to bring about the union of the two? When in the great schism of the fourteenth century, Pope Urban was elected at Rome, and his rival, Pope Clement, at Avignon, the two Popes anathematised and excommunicated each other, and each called the other "Anti-Pope." Who was the Pope here, and who the anti-pope? Were they to pay their allegiance to Urban of Downing Street or to Clement of Birmingham, or were they to take refuge in some union of both in the shape of a mythical "Pope Joan"? The contradictory utterances of the Prime Minister were reflected in the Ministry itself. Lord Salisbury, who denounced "rash policies and doubtful statistics," said—

> "The Government will not be responsible for presenting such a remedy as preference."

The Lord President of the Council stated that—

> "He never would have subscribed to the Government policy if it had included a tax upon food."

and the Postmaster-General had made utterances to the same effect. Yes: they made these statements now, but what would they say when "Mr. Richards" came back? Would not the right hon. Gentleman make short work of the free-traders, and be encouraged to do so by the knowledge that his adherents were in a majority in the Cabinet. Of the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer there was no doubt whatever. He had publicly expressed his sympathy with the Birmingham plan "in all its branches," he launched at the free-fooders the choicest adjectives in the Birmingham armoury, and he had recently declared that—

> "A time was coming when the country would insist upon the Government giving its attention to this matter."

That time was no doubt coming, but whether the mandate given by the country would be such as the right hon. Gentleman expected was open to question. The hon. Member for Central Bradford, who was a poet as well as a statesman, had compared the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Pitt, and had suggested that in him would be found the pilot that weathered the storm. If the hon. Member had contemplated the Members for West Bristol, Ealing, and Croydon out in the cold, another verse by the same writer might have occurred to him, and he might have added—

> Praise to placeless proud ability
> Let the prudent muse disclaim;
> And sing the Statesman all civility,
> Whom moderate talents raise to fame.

The opinions of the President of the Board of Trade, of the President of the Local Government Board, and of the Irish Secretary were always interesting, but the member of the Cabinet whose opinions were of the most importance in this matter was the Minister who held the purse-strings—the Minister who, if any man, would so manipulate the next Budget as to leave the door open for the preference or protection which was to be the salvation of the country. The right hon. Gentleman would no doubt be heard on this occasion. His promotion had been a most encouraging recognition of unsuspected merit, paralleled only in the examples of Phaeton and Caligula, and doubtless his declarations on the question would not be lacking in positiveness. But what was the result of the debate? The President of the Board of Trade declared that the Government policy was not protection or the taxation of food—although the next day he said he would be glad to see a moderate tax on food—and he added—

> "We are prepared to fight for free trade."

If the right hon. Gentleman was sincere in that declaration he would have to go and have it out on the Nile. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade was frankly protectionist, and the President of the Local Government Board had stated that he—

> "believes in a scheme designed to draw closer the Colonies and the mother country,"

> "it is in the main a question worth making considerable sacrifices for."

But in the main this was a question of taxing food, and the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of it, and added that it was unbecoming for an English gentleman to remain in a Government when no longer in sympathy with it. Therefore both the right hon. Gentleman and the Government were in sympathy with a proposal involving the taxation of food. Finally the Colonial Secretary had brought matters to a climax by an academic speech on protection which it was unnecessary to recall; so that while protection and food taxes were tremblingly disavowed in one breath they were as tremblingly avowed in another. Those of the Unionist Party who believed in free food held still the views which the Conservative Party had always professed in the past. They were not the heretics; they were the orthodox members of the Party. The Colonial Secretary had stated that the Government would support those who "honestly" supported the Government programme, and also those candidates who were—that is to say, go as far as preference and food-taxing. The Government, therefore, were in favour both of those who opposed and of those who favoured a tax on food. But the right hon. Gentleman made a most offensive accentuation of the word "honestly," as though to suggest that in this matter some Unionists were honest and others not—an insinuation unworthy of the Minister who made it, and repelled by those against whom it was directed. What did it come to? Take the case of two Unionists standing again each other for one seat—as at Chippenham—one a food-taxer and the other a free-fooder. If the free-fooder was, in the opinion of the Government, honest, he would get Government support. The food-taxer would get it whether or no. Both would receive such assistance as the central office could give, and all the assistance of the local associations. Both would receive a letter from the Prime Minister wishing each of them success against the other, and, although there was but one seat and one vote, every loyal Conservative would be bound to vote for both candidates! Was ever anything so childish? He had used the word "Government," but was there a Government? Could there be a Government with two contrary minds, unable to control its own members or to adhere for twenty-four hours to its own statements. Was there anything on the Front Ministerial Bench to inspire confidence at home and respect abroad? Could they view with complacency, in a crisis such as had arisen in the Far East, the prospect of the interests of this country being committed to a Government of settled contradictions and unsettled convictions? The Government had neither managed things, administered Departments, nor controlled events. Things had managed them. departments had administered them, events had smothered them. They had not been a Government but only a debauch of power. Therefore those who thought as he did had no choice. Those who felt for the needy to whom the price of bread was of vast importance could not do anything but vote for this Amendment. To vote against it would be giving a vote for dearer food and taxed bread. ["No, no!"] Whether His Majesty's Government might seek again to renew the assurances they had made and recalled and then made again he knew not. For him it was too late. He could be reconciled by no death-bed repentance, and because he believed in cheap and free food it would be his duty to vote for the Amendment. There was more at stake here than free trade or fair trade, or the binding together of the Empire, for beneath all this was the honour of public men and public life. Parties could only be formed by a common conviction, and could only be kept together by confidence on both sides, confidence mutual in leaders and followers. That confidence they had gone far to lose. It had been seriously impaired, and His Majesty's Government appeared to have entirely abandoned those Conservative principles which they set out with, and which he still believed in. The Government might triumph, they would triumph in the division lobby; but when the great appeal came, his belief was that an indignant and honest people would punish those who had abandoned their principles, and justify those who had stood fast to them.

Mr. ELLIOT (Durham): I shall not trespass for more than a very few minutes upon the time of the House. I wish to say that I left the Government because it was perfectly clear that, after the resignation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and the letter of the Prime Minister, to my great sorrow, the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government was going to give his support, and was actually giving his support, to the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. After that, as an honest man, I could not remain on that Bench and be in any way responsible for the financial business of the country. Therefore it was my business to make room for someone else with honest convictions, no doubt able to further the policy to which I, at all events, was strongly opposed. The division we are about to take will be the first occasion when the Parliamentary forces come to a distinct issue upon free trade versus protection. We have been told that these are mere phrases used as battle cries, and they have not the precise meaning which ought to be attached to them, and we are told that we should be more particular about our terms. The Prime Minister also tries to rally the country in the cause of fiscal reform. If protection does not mean anything, then what has the right hon. Gentleman to say in regard to fiscal reform? What does that term include, and what does it exclude? My right hon. friend gives us good advice, but "he recks not his own rede." He is bound to be more definite himself in the terms he uses, and this is a matter of considerable importance. I cannot bring myself to believe that this question turns upon the meaning of a phrase. It is perfectly easy to find in the discussion which has been going on expressions and arguments used by the Prime Minister which are in antagonism to the theories and conclusions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I can find antagonistic passages, and I can set one against the other, but this is no paper war, no question between a pamphlet here and a speech there, but a question as to the action and conduct of the Ministers of the Crown, and whether that has been in support, substantially, of the views which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has put before the country. No one regrets more than I do that the Prime Minister is not here. I regretted leaving the right hon. Gentleman's Government, because I was proud to serve under him. We know the great importance he attaches to Party discipline, and we know that he is actuated by no unworthy motives. But we have to look at the facts for ourselves, and we have to see where we stand. I was under the impression that this was a fiscal debate. When the late Chancellor of the Exchequer left the Government, and I regained my freedom, I had no idea that henceforth that great Department to which we had belonged was to remain silent in a fiscal debate. Why is my right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer there, and why is he silent? He is the Chancellor of the Exchequer ad hoc, and he was put there not only from the high esteem in which the Prime Minister held him, but because he was known to be in favour of the great scheme which his right hon. relative was laying before the country. We are told by the Prime Minister that that policy is not before the country. Why not? There has been a very important controversy throughout all the by-elections, and I refer to them not merely to mention the results of the poll, but also in order to point out what the country thinks is before it. Any hon. Member who has followed those contests will agree that what the constituencies believe is before the country is the question of protection. It is all very well for the right hon, Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to tell Londoners to "think Imperially," but when an election contest is on. I find that it is a very long time since elections have been fought upon such parochial interests as those which have been before us at the last few by-elections. The right hon. Gentleman is a great Imperialist in the City of London, but at Birmingham he devotes himself to pearl buttons.

There are some great interests which deserve to be considered as Imperial factors. I will not go into figures at this time of the debate, but I will mention the great shipping and carrying trade. That is a business or trade which, if any business or trade in this country deserves to be called Imperial, is Imperial. Our flag is carried from one end of the earth to the other, and it is responsible for the terrible introduction of imports into this country. Here we see one of the three or four gigantic fallacies on which the proposal for a change in the fiscal system is based. It is a grand fallacy that this country is being ruined by its imports. We hardly need to look at the statistics to know this. We may trust, to a certain extent, to the evidence of our own eyes. For my part, I can only say that if any man looks on the magnificent fleets approaching the ports of London, Glasgow, and Liverpool, and pouring wealth into our docks and wharves from all parts of the world as an element of decay, and if he says that on this account British working men will have nothing to do and that they will have to twiddle their thumbs because of want of employment, then I say to my protectionist friend that he is talking nonsense, and culpable nonsense, which is contradicted by experience and the evidence of his own eyes. Am I to be told that all this is disastrous to the trade of the country? Are we to be told that there is a toll to be paid before these ships come into our docks? Imports are merchandise brought into England because Englishmen are in want of that merchandise. They are not brought in for nothing. I am unable to see disaster to this country in the fact that so much wealth comes in to us and comes in so cheap. I do not wish to go into the merits of a question which is not before us, but I would say one word on the merits of colonial federation. We are all in favour of it. The first essential is that we should build on some rather substantial foundation—something that will be durable. Now, is the putting of a duty on corn that stable foundation on which to build? The 1s. duty on corn was taken off a few months ago. We were told that the duty on corn was to be a fixed charge, and that it was not to be increased. What would happen here is what has happened in other countries. If it remains, it will certainly be increased. It is proposed also that there should be a tax on dairy produce. Can anybody seriously suppose that on such an uncertain basis as that we can construct a perfect system?

As to the position His Majesty's Government propose to take—because that is the real matter which makes our discussion and the vote which will be taken to-night of such great importance—I know that right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench have not held practically the same language. I know that the President of the Board of Trade has not held exactly the same language as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade, and I know that an ardent supporter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham said—

> "We need not give any special attention to the President of the Board of Trade's speech because, after all, it amounts to nothing but an interim report."

Some of us, I believe, on these Benches were inclined to think that my right hon. friend gave solemn pledges for the Government, and said that the Government were not in favour of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I hope that any hon. Members who have doubts about it will remember how that speech has been described by a supporter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and how the Secretary to the Board of Trade has dissociated himself entirely from the language of the President. It is not only the language of members of the Government to which I refer but it is to their conduct as well. When contests have been going on in the country gentlemen have gone down as Government candidates with letters from the Prime Minister in their pockets giving them testimonials as representatives of the Government policy. I am informed that at the present moment a noble Lord who is standing for a seat in Birmingham is going down there to represent the policy of the Government. That noble Lord is a very strong advocate for taxation of food, and he is also, I believe, in favour of a 10 per cent. duty on manufactured goods imported into this country. If any one of the right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench gets up and says, "All this is a mistake, we took that line, but we are taking it no longer, and we are determined to dissociate ourselves from the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham," I should in those circumstances doubt whether I should go into the lobby in favour of the Amendment moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Montrose Burghs; but while they are using their whole influence and power —because it is nothing less than that— to support the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham I shall certainly go against them in the lobby to-night. It is greatly to be deplored that the Prime Minister is not present, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham also is not here. I am not one of those who condemn the Front Bench opposite for sticking to its guns. Irrespective of anything they might have to tell us, irrespective of the details of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and irrespective of all the interest and importance of the two right hon. Gentlemen who are absent, I cannot forget that we are here as the House of Commons and that we have a duty to perform. Though we may deplore the absence of the right hon. Gentlemen we are not absolved and cannot be absolved from putting before the country the views which the House of Commons holds on the important matters now before us. It has had too little to say hitherto in this great controversy. If the debate which has been going on and which has brought out so much ability and eloquence during the last eight days could only have taken place last summer much misfortune would have been avoided, and the Government would have been in a stronger position than they are now. Owing to the absence of discussion they have been sinking deeper and deeper in the gulf of protection. I say it is their doings and they are responsible for this condition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has now behind him four-fifths of the Conservative forces. The Government should have dissociated themselves from a policy of which they did not approve. They are bound to have a policy on a question of such enormous magnitude. My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade said "Let it be an open question." I would ask my right hon. friend, if he were present, if he, as a fair-minded man, considered that that represented the situation. Suppose that the most powerful member of any Government next to the Prime Minister left the Government in order to advocate disestablishment, suppose that he won over to himself the caucus, and established a great organisation, suppose that he had been enabled to embark thousands of pounds in the cause and that he had gradually drawn to himself great support, and if the Prime Minister had allowed the regular Party organisation to be at his call, then what would have happened? Does my right hon. friend mean to say it would have been long before questions would have been put to the Front Bench. The Archbishop of Canterbury in another place, and the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich in this House, would have considered it their duty to compel Ministers to speak out, and to find out whether that policy had or had not their support. I believe the Chief Secretary for Ireland is likely to speak this afternoon. I implore him, for the sake of the House of Commons, to do violence to his own nature, and not to make a clever and ingenious speech. I ask that he should use a few simple, straightforward phrases. Do not let us have any more hovering over retaliation. He has got to deal with something other than retaliation. I know that my right hon. friend claimed, I think it was in a speech at Workington, that it is our duty to fearlessly resume our freedom of negotiation. That sounds very great. But, when one looks into the applicability of the circumstances with which we have to deal, we find that there is something less than courage in it. I hope my right hon. friend will not indulge in talk of that kind, but come forward and say whether he is for or against the taxation of food, and a 10 per cent. duty on manufactures, and whether he regards free imports as disastrous to the country. I have had put into my hands a leaflet issued on the authority of the Central Conservative Association deprecating free imports. It says it is a mischievous thing that there should be free imports, and it asks us to substitute a system of reciprocity. That is the way the electors are dealt with at contested elections. I want to know what is being done by agents and candidates and newspapers, and I want to know whether what is being done is or is not repudiated by the right hon. Gentleman.

I am told that the Amendment involves a declaration of want of confidence in the Government. I am bound to say with sorrow, but the most sincere conviction, that my confidence in the fiscal policy of His Majesty's Government is not unlimited. I have no confidence in the fiscal policy of the Government. I see that some of them appear to have no confidence in their own policy. One right hon. Gentleman watches another right hon. Gentleman, and I am told that statements have been made by active representatives of the Government which were in singularly unhappy opposition to each other. We know the position, and the position cannot be altered. It is not a question of words. It is a question of how we are to deal with the facts, and I, for my part, cannot understand how any man who calls himself a free-trader at all, who has any belief in the advantages of free imports, who has any dislike to the system of German and American protection—I do not understand how any such man can hesitate to go into the lobby with the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment.

SIR A. SEALE HASLAM (Newcastle-under-Lyme) said he thought that in the regrettable absence of the Prime Minister this discussion might have been postponed with advantage to the Members of the House. They had been under very serious disadvantages. They knew generally what the views of the Prime Minister were, but they regretted that he was not there to make known his views and answer the arguments that had been put forward. He ventured to say that if the Prime Minister had been present some of the observations made in the House would not have been heard. Speeches had been delivered by politicians and business men, but he regretted that there had not been more of the latter. He had listened with very great pleasure and satisfaction to the speeches of the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich and the hon. Member for Oldham, although he did not agree with them. They were, he thought, not the most competent men to give the best opinion on the subject under discussion. He regretted that these two hon. Members, who were in political partnership, were not in some great business partnership, employing 5,000 men, with their own capital, called upon to compete in the neutral markets of the world, or where protection existed, and where they had no opportunity of trading, or where they would have to face the competition which was recently called "dumping" in this country. He admired the ability of the two hon. Gentlemen and their intellect, but they had not the experience of those who had been engaged in business thirty or forty years, and who knew something of the great trade problems and of the difficulty of finding work for their employees, who knew how men who were only half employed became demoralised, and how men who were wholly out of work became dangerous to the community, how poverty, hunger, and distress roused the worst passions of men. He ventured to say that if all these things were realised by hon. Members they would strengthen the hands of the Government and enable them to do something to improve the state of the nation. If that were the results of the discussion he believed it would not have been in vain.

They had been told that the sum of the imports into and the exports from this country indicated great prosperity, and that these amounted to £900,000,000. They had been told that if our imports exceeded our exports that showed that it was all right. They were told that our imports were paid for either by the goods we exported, or by the sale of securities, or by the services we rendered abroad. But the affairs of a State were very much the same as the affairs of an individual. We had enjoyed in this country an apparent prosperity, and a great deal had been said about our home trade. But had it occurred to any of those Gentlemen that our imports might swell very largely when we were getting into debt on a large scale? He thought that those who compared the state of this country and our indebtedness must feel some curious alarm at the increase of the indebtedness of the nation, whether Imperial or municipal. That indebtedness had increased almost 62 per cent. in the last ten years. He himself could not see how we could reduce the expense on the Navy or the Army; but what was worse, our expense was growing in our municipalities. In Imperial expenditure there was charged to revenue in 1903–4 £144,000,000, and to capital £6,000,000, or a total of £150,000,000; and in 1893–4 the charge to revenue was £91,303,000; and the charge to capital £877,000, or a total of £92,180,000. In municipal expenditure in 1900–1 the charge out of income was £98,180,000; and out of loans £35,533,000, or a total of £133,713,000. In 1890–1 the charge out of income was £62,109,000: and out of loans £8,528,000, or a total of £70,637,000; while the expenditure for 1903–4 was likely to amount to £150,000,000. What were they to learn from that? That they must raise their poundage rates and assessments. If this expenditure was going on the consequences must be serious. If anyone doubted that, look at the price of corporation stock! Some of these stood at 117 ten years ago and were now quoted at 90, and there was a difficulty in selling them at that figure. As our debt had grown our imports had increased. If our imports went on increasing over our exports it was impossible for this country to enjoy the prosperity in the future which she have enjoyed in the past. The existing extravagance must be stopped. There was no doubt that those who had given the closest attention to this subject were begining to realise that if we were to recover our position we should have to work harder and be more economical. A great deal had been said about dumping He employed a large number of men, and he was bound to confess that dumping was at present an advantage to him personally. But he feared that if, in the future, dumping went on, our primary industries would be affected by the competition of the dumped goods. He was a free-trader, and had always been a free-trader, but not a one-sided free-trader. He believed that free trade, so long as it was mutual, was a profit to both sides and an advantage to and promoted the prosperity of each.

A few weeks ago the hon. Member for North-West Durham had come into his constituency and addressed a meeting there. He did not object to the hon. Member going there; it had been a distinct advantage to himself. But he would tell the hon. Member that there was a considerable amount of depression in his constituency, and that there was no use arguing that the state of things was the most perfect ever enjoyed in the country. There were manufacturers who had recently started businesses on the Continent, not because they wanted to do so, or to take work from their workmen, but because the doors in these countries had been closed against their exports. Those were only a few instances of many which he could bring before the House; but they were sufficient to show that the industries which his friends had started on the Continent were distinctly disadvantageous to and would decrease employment in this country. The 60 per cent. duty which was imposed had put an end to trade with the United States, but the worst of it was that the country's best workmen were emigrating to the United States, and were carrying on industries which supplied all the requirements of the American market. The pottery industry was not perhaps one of the largest, but it was one of the most important industries in the country. Its total value was £3,500,000. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North-West Durham said that imports had not seriously affected that industry, but the imports amounted to £750,000, which was a very serious matter in his constituency, as it meant a reduction of between £300,000 and £400,000 per annum in wages. He could quote several other instances to show that the present system was not the best system for the country. With reference to Mr. Cobden, he did not think that anything was to be gained by sneering at him, or by endeavouring to depreciate the magnificent services which he had rendered to the country. He yielded to no man in his admiration of Mr. Cobden, and if he had been a politician at the time he would have voted for Mr. Cobden's policy. But a great many changes had occurred since then, and unfortunately the prophecies of Mr. Cobden had not been verified. Mr. Cobden said that probably within ten years the whole world would follow the example of this country; but, as they now saw, the situation was exactly the reverse. Who would have thought in Mr. Cobden's time that a steamer would carry goods across the Atlantic at 1s. per ton? All the changes which had occurred deserved the most careful attention. Hon. Gentlemen opposite said that the present position of the country was due to free trade, but he thought they ought also to take into account the British mercantile marine, the telegraph and telephone services, and the many other inventions which had contributed to the prosperity of the nation.

If the present free-trade system were continued, it would bring disaster on the industries of the country. He quite agreed that an inquiry was necessary, and an inquiry would shortly take place with the result that a large amount of information would be collected which would be useful to Members on both sides of the House. But whether the inquiry would be sufficiently comprehensive was another matter. Hon. Members might recollect the great discussion which took place years ago with regard to a load-line for ships. As a result a load-line was established, but foreign steamers were allowed to enter British harbours without a load-line, and to trade under conditions which would not be permitted to British vessels. He hoped the Government would take a broad view of the situation, and especially consider the splendid British mercantile marine, which was the admiration of the world, and which had conferred enormous benefit not only on this country but on the world. The British people did not like change. They did not like anything that was new or too ambitious; but a great and mighty force had been introduced into politics, and the time had come when they ought to raise their voices and put forth their strength, and have the courage of their convictions, both in the House of Commons and the country, and make the truth known to people who might have been misled by incorrect figures. He had studied very carefully the speech of the Prime Minister and the pamphlet which he wrote, and he considered that the Prime Minister's views were very moderate. The Prime Minister had only one idea with regard to this question and that was to improve the position of the trade and commerce of the country. He thanked hon. Members very kindly for the manner in which they had listened to the imperfect remarks which he had addressed to the House. They might differ from him as to lines of policy; but his friends opposite respected his views, as was manifested by the manner in which they had listened to him.

*MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): We are now drawing to the close of a debate which, in many of its features, is, I believe, unexampled in the annals of the House of Commons. We are concerned—ostensibly concerned—with an Amendment to the Address on the King's Speech, and I believe it to be the opinion of all impartial onlookers that rarely, if ever, has there been a more one-sided discussion heard within these walls. Some of the ablest and most convincing speeches in support of the Amendment have come from the Government Benches. And what, Sir, has become of the propaganda which has been tearing like a tornado through the country during the whole of the autumn months? It has made a great deal of noise outside, but the air of Westminster, somehow or other, seems to have a sedative effect upon it, and we have heard nothing in the course of this debate but faint and halting and almost apologetic echoes. Still more noteworthy have been the performances of the Ministers of the Crown. Some of them do not seem quite to know their own minds. None of them, so far as I can discover, know the minds of their colleagues. And all of them, when they are hard pressed, to a man take refuge in the undisclosed mind of the Prime Minister. On the first night of the debate the President of the Board of Trade delivered himself of some sound and robust free-trade sentiments, accompanying them no doubt with a plea for the liberty of pious opinion, and a frank confession of his own personal hankerings for some system of preference. Next night he was followed by his subordinate—the Secretary of his own Department—who made an interesting speech. If I might venture, with great respect to the hon. Gentleman, to make one criticism upon it, it would be this—that I think he was unduly liberal in the exercise of a dangerous faculty with which he is endowed, the faculty of stating a fallacy as though it were a truism. However that may be, of one thing there can be no doubt, that the Secretary to the Board of Trade took up, one after another, almost all the most venerable and most vulnerable positions of the most antiquated protectionism. His arguments have been completely disposed of by subsequent speakers on both sides of the House, and I will venture to say by no one with more lucidity, more cogency, or more destructive force than by my hon. friend the Member for Colne Valley (Sir J. Kitson), who, by the way, is, I believe, neither a lawyer nor doctrinaire. Well, the next figure in this strange procession was the President of the Local Government Board, of whom I will say with the utmost personal respect that at the close of his speech, when I tried to speculate upon the precise stage which his convictions had reached, I find myself, and still remain, in impenetrable darkness. Then came the turn of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the tenor and effect of whose speech I am sure is fresh in the memory of the House. When my right hon. friend, in his picturesque way, compared the hapless British producer face to face with his tariff-clad competitors, to the undisciplined Gaul confronting Cæsar and his legions, I think no one of us was in doubt as to the sphere of influence in which he moved. I shall have something to say in a few minutes in reference to one or two of my right hon. friend's contentions; but before I part company with him now in the most friendly spirit I should like to make one incidental criticism. In the graceful tribute which he paid to the right. hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham he told us that, the more he familiarised himself with the records of his own office, the more he was impressed, not only with the business capacity, but the splendid idealism of his predecessor. This was a very natural and appropiate expression of his feeling; but I could not help thinking that it would have been equally interesting to the House, and perhaps still more relevant to the issue of this debate, if the right hon. Gentleman could have told us that, while ransacking the archives of his Department, he had come across some trace of the missing colonial offer. Friday, so far as the Treasury Bench was concerned, was a day off; but, notwithstanding the absence of the Prime Minister, which we all regret, and whose return to our proceedings will be welcomed with equal warmth in every quarter of the House, there are still Ministers left on that Bench, Cabinet Ministers, whom we have not heard yet. We have not in this debate heard the voice of the Minister primarily responsible for the management of the finances of the country, and it is quite possible that we have not yet come to the end of the process which is described, I believe, in nautical circles as "boxing the compass." He would indeed be a bold man who at this hour of the afternoon would predict with any confidence in what direction it will point at twelve o'clock to-night. Every one knows the lines which are to be found in the immortal description by a too candid friend of one of the greatest orators and thinkers who ever sat in the House—

> "Though fraught with all learning, yet
> straining his throat
> To persuade Tommy Townshend to lend > him a vote."

Men come and go—I do not see a Burke at this moment on the Treasury Bench—but Parliamentary necessities survive and recur. I cannot help thinking that, if we knew the whole truth of the situation, the real arbiter, more potent even than the Prime Minister, the hidden hand which holds the musical box and turns on the tune every night, is the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury.

There is one figure, as almost every speaker has acknowledged, whom we miss from this discusssion hardly less than that of the Prime Minister himself—I mean, of course, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. In common with everybody, I deplore the cause, and perhaps I may venture to say I have special reason to regret the fact of his absence. Ever since the right hon. Gentleman inaugurated his autumn campaign at Glasgow I have been towards him in the relation of an anxious, pertinacious, and disappointed inquirer. I have respectfully put to him a number of questions—simple questions, direct questions, but questions to which, simple and direct as they were, not the semblance of an answer has yet been vouchsafed. I do not think his absence, much as we regret it, makes it incumbent on me and others to suspend the process of interrogation in this place, which is the only place in the country where antagonistic policies and their spokesmen can meet face to face. The right hon. Gentleman has been described justly as the protagonist of the piece, but he has many able "understudies" in and outside the Government, and there is special reason and special relevance for pressing one or two of these inquiries. Ministers who sit on that Bench may talk about retaliation until the crack of doom—which, I suppose, is another way of describing the next general election—though there does not appear to be a single man among them capable of defining it in intelligible language; but it is not retaliation, but protection; it is not the Sheffield enigma, it is the Birmingham policy which interests, and will continue to interest, the electors of the country. They care little or nothing what the policy or the avowed policy of His Majesty's Goverment may be. I will tell the Government why. Because they have the best reasons for doubting whether the Government as they sit on that Bench are strong enough to have a policy of their own, whether they are strong enough to adhere to it, and, above all, whether they are strong enough to compel the allegiance to it of the Party which sits behind them.

I am not going to rehearse the catalogue of my futile inquiries. I shall confine my interrogations to-night to two points, as to which it appears to me the policy of the right hon. Member for Birmingham and the avowed or official policy of His Majesty's Government rest on common ground. The first question is this. The common assumption which underlies both is that our trade, and especially our trade over sea, exhibits signs, not perhaps of immediate decay, but of imminent and serious danger. Every one knows the now classical phrase of the right hon. Member for Birmingham—the trade of the United Kingdom has been practically stagnant for 30 years. Now, the question I have to ask of those who entertain that view, and make it the basis of the various stages of the policy for fiscal change now before the country, is when and how was this discovery made? I am not going back to ancient history, I am not going back to 1881, to 1885, or even to 1896, I shall come to a date as recent as January, 1902—that is to say, sixteen months before the new crusade was started, and only two years from the time at which we are met here to-night—and I want to ask the attention of the House to some language which was used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham himself in the city of Birmingham on 6th January, 1902. The House will see in a moment the relevancy of the question I put. The right hon. Gentleman said—

> "I have lately seen a good deal of discussion in the papers about the crisis in British industry. Well, if the crisis means an imminent and pressing danger, I think the accounts are altogether exaggerated. I see no signs of any imminent or pressing danger to the prosperity of this country. During the last five years"—

That is, within the thirty years—

> "we have enjoyed an absolutely unparalleled condition of trade, and although we cannot expect that this will last for ever, although there are some signs that trade is not so brisk as it was, still, to my mind, the prospects are extremely good, and I am not at all disposed to take a pessimistic view of the situation."

This, at the time when glass was gone, when silk had disappeared, when iron was going, and when wool was threatened! Yes, but the right hon. Gentleman does see some signs of possible danger, and how does he propose it should be met?—

> "In order to keep the trade we have got, in order that we may develop in proportion as our population increases, employers and employed must do their utmost, they must not go backward, they must keep alive to the spirit of the times. . . . Employers have to bring to bear more scientific intelligence to the management of their business."

That is the doctrine of the pedants and lawyers whose testimony is scouted, as we know, by the Secretary of the Board of Trade and other practical men of business. This is the despised Charlottenburg policy—

> "The old rule of thumb methods will not last for ever; and in the presence"—

Of what? tariffs? not at all.

> "of the development of science abroad, it is perfectly certain that we shall suffer seriously, unless our manufacturers take advantage of the opportunities afforded to them to bring the highest theoretical knowledge into combination with practical experience."

Then the right hon. Gentleman goes on to the workman's side of the question and makes a complaint of what he conceives to be the retrograde methods of trades unions. Here is the conclusion of the whole matter, which I adopt as part of my argument. It is the best statement of the case I have ever read—

> "I have ventured to give advice to the employers to take advantage of the opportunities provided for them to develop their brains. I venture to advise the working classes of this country also to take advantage of their special opportunities to develop the product of their labour. If these two conditions are fulfilled, I for one am perfectly confident that there is no fear for the future, no fear that we shall take an inferior position to that of our ancestors, no fear that we shall not meet competition from whatever quarter it comes, that we shall not meet the rivalries of all the world."

I ask the House, in view of these wise and weighty words, uttered not in a remote past, but two years ago, does not the whole of this movement, as far as it is put forward in the supposed interests of domestic trade, assume the aspect of a farce? What has happened since January, 1902? Two years have passed. The right hon. Gentleman himself said in his speech at Liverpool that 1902 was one of the best years British trade had ever known, and 1903 is now known as a record year in the whole history of the industry of this country. ["No."] I am speaking of the Board of Trade Returns, and yet we are now assured from the same quarter, by the same voice, that only by a fiscal revolution, and by a return to the stalest devices of protection, can we preserve our decaying trade, and what is more, our dissolving Empire. The right hon. Gentleman would say, if he were here, that he is entitled to change his views. But what we are protesting against is the assumption which underlies his speeches and those of many of his supporters, that because he has changed his views, therefore the facts of history and the rules of logic and the processes of arithmetic and the very laws of nature herself have undergone a simultaneous and corresponding change. At the Council of Constance the Emperor Sigismund, being pulled up for a false concord in a Latin allocution which he addressed to the assembled prelates, made a reply which is famous in history—Ego sum Rex Romanorum et supra grammaticam. I think that a somewhat similar claim is being made for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, only his superiority is alleged to extend over a far wider field than that claimed by the Holy Roman Emperor.

I come to the other point as to which I desire a little further light, and it relates to the proposed import duty of 10 per cent. on manufactures that come from outside. That was originally proposed, as we know, to fill up the hole in the revenue which would be caused by the suggested remissions of taxation on sugar and tea. But it was not a revenue duty.

Why? Because, if it had been, a corresponding Excise duty would have been proposed on the same articles manufactured at home; in other words, it was avowedly a protective duty. If there is one thing that is axiomatic in fiscal theory and practice it is this, that you cannot combine in one and the same imposition a revenue and a protective duty. Just to the extent that it is efficient for one purpose it is inefficient for the other. If it succeeds in bringing in revenue, of course, it fails to protect. On the other hand, if it succeeds in protecting, it follows as a necessary consequence that it does not bring in revenue. Every speaker on the other side has tried to run this duty of 10 per cent. both as one thing and the other. They have really got two horses running in diametrically opposite directions, and they must elect on which saddle they will sit. I was surprised that the Colonial Secretary, in the course of his speech the other night, suggested that the late Liberal Cabinet were prevented from protesting against the protective character of this proposed duty because we had assented to an import duty of 5 per cent. in the Indian tariff. Was that a protective duty? Had my right hon. friend when he made that charge, which is not very relevant to any question in this debate, read the despatch from the Government of India on 22nd October last, included in the Papers lately presented to the House? I will read the words of the Government of India—

> "In respect of imports the Indian tariff, as you are aware, with one or two unimportant exceptions, imposes duties purely for revenue purposes. It is entirely free from any trace of preference and any protective intention."

Neither in fact nor in intention is it protective.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): My statement was made entirely with reference to a remark made by the right hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs, that in agreeing with Mr. Charles Booth that an all-round 5 per cent. duty was a possible matter for discussion at any rate, I subjected myself to be called a protectionist. I said that inasmuch as that was the Indian fiscal system the right hon. Gentleman and all his colleagues were subject to the same imputation.

*MR. ASQUITH: That is exactly what is not the case, and this can be shown by a very simple test. Will Mr. Charles Booth, or my right hon. friend, in so far as he adopts his scheme, agree to the imposition of a corresponding Excise duty on all articles produced in this country on which the 5 per cent. import duty is imposed? That is a fair test.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: It is only on cotton.

*MR. ASQUITH: I recommend the hon. Gentleman to read the despatch; he will find all the information there. Cotton is the most important, but there are many others. I wish to ask one or two questions with reference to this 10 per cent. import duty. Is it intended to apply to colonial as well as to foreign products? Is it intended to be an equal preference for all industries here or a privilege only for some? Agriculture cannot gain any benefit from it at all. What about the cotton trade? We manufacture here every year, partly for export and partly for the home market, £100,000,000 of cotton goods. Our imports are £5,000,000. What about the shipbuilding trade, and the building trade, which employs 1,000,000 of workpeople in this country? No one of these trades can derive any advantage from import duties, while, on the other hand, there are ingredients imported which enter into their manufacturing processes, the cheapness of which is absolutely vital to the successful and profitable carrying on of their work. Iron, steel, leather, oil, and flour will all be increased in price. I say that this duty is unintelligent in conception, unequal in application; it protects one trade, and not only does not protect but penalises another; and, finally, as an instrument of revenue it can only succeed to the extent in which it fails as an instrument of protection.

I should like to deal now with a serious and interesting argument put forward by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The Colonial Secretary suggested that our factory legislation—legislation for the protection of labour against insanitary conditions—is inconsistent with the doctrine of free trade, that it increases the cost of production here, and therefore justifies a compensatory protection as against other countries. This is a very important point. What I wish to make perfectly clear is our position in this matter. How does my right hon. friend attempt to show any inconsistency between the two things? Only by the assumption that our free-trade system is an affirmation and that our factory laws are a negation of some abstract doctrine of laissez faire. That is not the case. The people of this country became free-traders, and will continue to be free-traders, not through the preaching of dogma, but through the teaching of experience. I quite agree with my right hon. friend that some of the early free-traders did not recognise the fact (though it is a great mistake to suppose that Lord Ashley was supported by protectionists only); but the real fact is that our factory legislation and our free-trade system are the proper complements of one another. Why? Because both are necessary to prevent an uneconomic, which means a wasteful, application and distribution of the productive power of the community. Under protection we wasted labour and capital on making things which other people could make better; and under the old factory system of unregulated labour you wasted the lives and strength of the mothers and children of the nation, and by so doing you crippled its productive resources, power and contaminated the very springs of its industrial vitality. It was the part of wise statesmanship to get rid both of the one and of the other. But that is a question of principle. Let us look at the practical application. Does it, as my right hon. friend assumes, increase the cost of production? I absolutely deny it. On the contrary, I assert, and I believe it to be borne out by the experience of every civilised country, that the workman is a more efficient productive instrument, that he does a larger quantity of good work in a given time, if he works under sanitary conditions, with an adequate provision of light air, and ventilation, and with proper safeguards against the risk of injury from machinery and other causes. I say that if the children are sent to school—as, thank Heaven, they are now—in their tender years, instead of being sent to the factory; if the girls and women who work are compelled to observe the special precautions proper to their sex—I say that the extra expense involved is more than repaid by a sounder, more robust, and more intelligent industrial population. My right hon. friend quotes a passage from a speech of mine in which I pointed out that the German workman works longer hours at lower wages, and with an inferior standard of comfort to our own population. That is perfectly true. [An HON. MEMBER: No factory system.] That interruption shows with how much knowledge the hon. Member speaks. The factory code in Germany is more elaborate than our own; and the real reason for the inferior position of the German workman is not a bad factory code, but protection—the shutting out of the free influx of imports and the partial closing of the door of the open market, which raises the cost of living, and therefore cuts down the real remuneration of labour. While I have listened to this discussion I have thought that there was a great deal of force in the suggestion put forward somewhere that we should put together as an enduring monument of the debate a short manual of protection for beginners, the first principles of which should be taken from the speeches of the Colonial Secretary, and the illustrations from the speeches of the Secretary to the Board of Trade. In odd moments I have endeavoured to construct for myself one or two pages of this imaginary catechism, and with the permission of the House I will give a few extracts—

> The first question is, "What is free trade?" And the answer is "A Shibboleth." "By whom was it invented?" "By one Adam Smith, a professor, who had probably never set foot in a factory in his life. A later writer, Carlyle, is a much safer guide." "How, then, did it come to be adopted as part of the policy of this country?" "Through the machinations of a middle-class conspiracy headed by one Cobden, whose main object was to lower the wages of labour." "How has the superstition managed to survive?" "Because there are people simple enough and short-sighted enough to imagine that in foreign trade it is well to receive more than you give." "Can you give a practical illustration of this?" "Since the year 1860 the imports into the United Kingdom have exceeded the exports, according to the Board of Trade Returns, by no less than £4,000,000,000 sterling." "What does that mean? Translate it into terms of wages and employment." "Roughly speaking, the loss in wages to British workmen is £2,000,000,000 sterling." "How then have we escaped ruin?" "By the mercy of Providence." "And how are we to set ourselves right?" "We must wait for the Report of the Tariff Commission."

I ask, is that a caricature of the arguments that have been used? [Cries of "No, no!"]

As to this topic of retaliation, there are some Gentlemen, I gather, who are going to absolve themselves selves from the duty of voting for the Amendment because they fancy that they can discern in the official policy of retaliation some form of fiscal change which would not involve a return to protection. The right hon. Member for Bristol said pointedly that he was going to support retaliation because it was a step in the opposite direction to protection. I fancy that nine out of every ten of those who support retaliation will be those who support it because they think it is the first and a long step on the road towards protection. We are entitled to come to close quarters with the Government on this subject of retaliation. Hitherto they have avoided all intelligible explanation on a two-fold plea—first, the absence of the Prime Minister, upon which I think no more need be said; and, secondly, the supposed example of Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone is said to have declined to disclose in advance some of the particulars in his Home Rule Bill, especially the position which the Irish Members were to hold. I can speak freely in this matter, because I was one of those who strongly urged upon Mr. Gladstone publicly that he should make the disclosure. But to compare that with the situation of to-day is to make an enormous draft on the credulity of this House. The real analogy would have been if Mr. Gladstone had asked for a mandate for Home Rule, without saying whether he meant to apply it to Ireland or to Scotland. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman who is to follow me two questions. First, what is the nature and what are the limits of the power which the Government are going to ask the country to confer on them? And, secondly, what is the kind of use which they contemplate making of the power so conferred? The first is a constitutional, and the second is an economic question; and a plain answer to both is essential to a clear understanding of the subject. First as to the power. It is a truism to say that any Minister may at any time come to the House of Commons to ask their assent to any measure, legislative, administrative, or fiscal, for which he has a producible and provable case. But it is said that this power is dormant or is unavailable in fiscal policy owing to inveterate tradition. But is it? This House was elected in 1900. Will anyone pretend that it was part of the mandate given by the electors in 1900 to make any change of any sort or kind in our fiscal system? But what have we done? In the year 1902, without any mandate or demand for further powers, we imposed what many of us believe to be a protective duty on corn, in direct violation of our fiscal traditions for many years past. And in 1903 we took the longest and strongest step that has ever been taken in the direction of this policy of retaliation in the shape of the Sugar Convention. In the face of these facts patent, recent, and notorious, how can any one say—if a case can be made out to the satisfaction of the majority of the House of Commons; and I think a bad case was made out in both those instances—that the Government have not at this moment every power that any constitutional Minister could require? I must press for a more specific answer than we have yet got to the question put by my right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition on the first night of the session—If you are not satisfied with that power, that is to say, the power of dealing ad hoc with the question as it arises, subject to the assent of the House of Commons, what is the character of the new powers with which you propose to clothe yourselves? They must take the form of some kind of general legislation—it may be subject to restrictions; I do not know what—but that general legislation, if it is to be effectively and practically worked for the objects which the Government profess to have in view, will have, sooner or later, to take the form which it has taken in every foreign protectionist country—of placing in the hands of the Executive a maximum and a minimum tariff and allowing it to apply the one or the other according to the circumstances of the case. We want to know whether that is the proposal which the Government are going to submit to the House. The second question is, What use are you going to make of this power? I want to have presented, what we have not yet had, an actual concrete case. We hear a great deal of talk about conceivable cases, of outrageous injustice and so forth; I want an actual concrete case. Will the right hon. Gentleman give me such a case? Let him give me an outrageous duty in existence now. Tell me by whom it is imposed; whether it is directed primarily or specially against us, or only against us in common with all the other countries in the world with whom the country imposing the duty is in actual or possible competition. Tell me what is the line your reprisals are going to take? Are they to be only against the commodity which the duty in question favours, or are they to be against the whole import trade of the country imposing it?

There is this question of dumping. How are you going to deal with dumping? Take the case of iron, which was taken by the Secretary to the Board of Trade. Is it only against dumped iron—that is, iron sold here at a lower price than in the country of origin—that you are going to retaliate? If so, you may go great lengths; for let us never forget that it is of the essence of protection to sell dear at home and cheap abroad. How are you going to find out whether it is dumped or not? Are you going to put your retaliatory duty on all goods which are sold here cheaper than they are sold in the country in which they are produced? Are you going to put it on, even although the dumping may be the result of the temporary action of a syndicate or combination of producers, or are you only going to put it on when there is a direct bounty given in the country of origin? And in that case, let me ask, are you going to discriminate between our Colonies and foreign countries?

I apologise to the House for enumerating such a series of dry and technical questions, but they are the practical questions upon which the political wisdom and fiscal efficacy of retaliation really depend. I venture to point out once more—as has been pointed out by many hon. Members who have preceded me—first, that in point of fact the countries which have the power of retaliation, and use it, have not fared any better than ourselves in dealing with protected markets: secondly, that you cannot effectively carry out your policy of retaliation, as was admitted by the President of the Board of Trade, against our most serious competitors, or some of them—certainly not against the United States of America—unless you tax both food and raw materials; and, thirdly, that, as all experience shows, the duty which begins by being retaliatory and provisional almost invariably ends by being protective and permanent. I should like before I conclude to give one illustration to the House of the spirit in which it appears to me this power of retaliation is likely to be used if entrusted to the present Government. I could take many, but I will take by way of illustration some words which fell from the Chief Secretary at Edinburgh in the month of November last, the most remarkable speech that I have read in the whole of this discussion. First of all—it is not exactly the point, but it is interesting to note—the right hon. Gentleman deprecated the magnitude of our foreign investments. He said that they were a sign of industrial decay. Why?

"In this country,"

he said,

"any man with £10,000 or £20,000 would hardly ever dream of putting it into any industrial enterprise at all."

I wonder how we manage to live.

"What does he do? He invests it abroad, believing that it is not safe to invest it at home."

That is pretty serious, but, serious as it is, it is nothing to the tragic consequences which the right hon. Gentleman has discovered to flow from the glut of imports. Let me read this passage—

"Great Britain, after sixty years of unmitigated free imports was a good place for drones, but let them not mistake"

I ask particular attention to these words

"let them not mistake the contented lullaby of the surfeited consumer for the busy murmur of the working hive."

Well, in all the rhetoric of the recess, copious and variegated as it has been, this sentence seems to me to be a gem that scintillates with unique and incomparable radiance. "The contented lullaby of the surfeited consumer!" Apart from the context the House might perhaps imagine that this was the picturesque description by a special reporter of the state of things which prevail when the loyal and patriotic toasts are proposed at the conclusion of a civic banquet. No, it is a description by a Minister of the Crown of the condition of British trade in the year 1903. "The busy murmur of the working hive!" It is to be found apparently only in countries with a scientific tariff, while we here, we poor Englishmen and Scotchmen and Irishmen, with our lamentable and pertinacious excess of imports over exports, we are a nation of drones, feeding idly upon the honey which is benevolently and, I presume, gratuitously provided for us by the eccentric foreigner. What does it all mean? Is this House, is this country, going to put the weapon of retaliation into the hands of gentlemen like the Chief Secretary, who think our foreign investments a proof of domestic insecurity, and who regard the magnitude of our imports as the measure of our industrial lethargy? But every argument which the right hon. Gentleman and many of his colleagues have used, when it comes to be analysed and examined, is seen to be an argument not for retaliation, not for any halfway house, not for any intermediate step, but for full-blown and uncompromising protection.

This Amendment of my right hon. friend raises a clear issue. It condemns any return to protective duties, and, in face of the language of Ministers which I have read and criticised, can any one say that such a declaration by the House of Commons is not opportune and indeed urgent? For aught I know we are going to-night—I do not know whether the Chief Secretary or the Home Secretary is to be the transforming hand—we are going to have another tilt of the see-saw, possibly renewed assurances of the unshaken devotion of the Government to the principles of free trade. Sir, I venture to say to the House that the question whether the present Ministers are safe custodians of the citadel of free trade is a question which cannot be settled by the utterances of perturbed and bewildered Ministers in the throes of a Parliamentary crisis. You must look to their whole conduct and attitude since the controversy was raised nine months ago—the period of unsettled convictions, the so-called inquiry, the Prime Minister's benediction to the departing missionary, the open patronage which has been extended to the propaganda of the autumn, the promises which have been given even in this debate of electoral support to its adherents. I submit to the House that it is not to such hands as these that the fortunes of free trade can safely be committed. For my part I think that the Government have been guilty of the vulgar error of being too clever by half. They have played, or tried to play, a game which in the long run never succeeds with the people of this country, a game of manœuvre and mystification. Ever since last May they have been trifling with the nation, just as to-night they are trying to trifle with the House of Commons. What up to now has been the result of a policy so alien to the best traditions of our public life? One has only got to look opposite to see—a discredited Ministry and a divided Party. The country is showing by evidence which cannot be misinterpreted—the last instalment came no later than two days ago from a hitherto impregnable stronghold of Toryism—the country is showing that it realises that in this matter there is one issue and only one, the issue between free trade upon the one side and protection upon the other. That issue is presented to this House to-night; let it by its vote anticipate the verdict of the nation.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): Before the speech was delivered to which I have to reply, a request was made to me by my hon. friend the Member for Durham with which I can very easily comply—namely, that I should not be ingenious and clever in my reply. I shall speak directly on the subject which I believe to be before this House, and I draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that, whatever else it may have been—eloquent and forcible as his speeches always are—the speech to which we have just listened from the right hon. Gentleman was chiefly characterised by its cleverness and by its ingenuity, with the purpose, ably followed from start to finish, of drawing me away from answering the request made to me by the hon. Gentleman, of distracting the attention of my hon. friend from the issue which is before the House, and of putting into everybody's mind the idea that we are debating the merits of protection against free trade. He dismissed the Amendment in the opening sentence, and towards the close of his speech he culled perhaps a too gaudy flower of rhetoric which decorated one of my own deliverances. I am not, however, going to be drawn into repeating or defending speeches which I have made [Ironical OPPOSITION cheers], and I am not to be deterred by ironical cheers from speaking as a Minister for my colleagues in definition and in defence of the policy of the Government. I repudiate altogether the absurd interpretation which the right hon. Gentleman has placed on my Edinburgh speech. Are we to be debarred from remarking on the emigration of British capital? Why, Mill himself puts it in the very forefront of his chapter on the taxation of commodities, and points out as one matter which ought to be considered in any inquiry into the working of taxation that with low profits the tendency of British capital will be more and more to go into foreign investments or to be swept away, and he prophesied that that would be the future tendency. I do not accept the interpretation placed by the right hon. Gentleman on my Edinburgh speech, or on many speeches which have been made in this House; but what has become of the anxiety of the mover of this Amendment for British trade? The right hon. and learned Member at an earlier period of his speech invited me if I followed him to defend, not only the policy, but the speeches of my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham and he quoted a speech of two years ago—I only touch upon these questions because he made it a point against the Government—and asked us, "When did you become uneasy over the state of British Trade?" I will take up that point. I will give another quotation out of that speech, and beg my hon. friends to listen to it—

> "We are face to face with a tremendous and strenuous competition; we have to hold our own against other nations, not too friendly; and it is for us a first necessity that we should find new markets and develop them, and that we should keep open old markets. If other nations were as liberal as we are in our commercial relations the burden would be much less."

Is there, I ask, any justification for the view which the right hon. Member has tried to impose upon the intelligence of my hon. friends that we have raised this question as a mere electioneering cry, and that we are not deeply concerned for the future prospects of British trade? The policy of the Government—and I had better state it in a manner which I think befits the statement of a policy not before the country, but announced as being the policy which the Government will submit to the electorate, that is to say in its broad outlines, but without any doubt in the terms which I use or any possibility of the words I use being susceptible of doubtful interpretation. The Government does ask this country that we should resume the freedom of negotiation for the purpose of attaining commercial advantages, which as a matter of historic fact has not been in the hands of any Government since the year 1860. We say that, in the event of such negotiations proving abortive, there must be an effective sanction behind those negotiations, we say that that sanction ought not to be used and will not be used by us except subject to the effective control of the House of Commons over the financial policy of this country. We also add that it should be liberated from the rigour of traditional restriction which has, as a matter of fact, strangled every diplomatic effort we have made and notoriously prevented a commercial arrangement with France, to effect which M. Léon Say came to this country as Ambassador in 1880. What ground have the Government advanced for asking that this new departure should be made? The first reason which we have advanced is that there is a growing uneasiness over the condition of British trade in relation to the trade of other countries. Are hon. Gentlemen opposite free from any anxiety upon that score? Why does the mover of this Amendment abide in this House by words which he has used in the country and still say, as I believe he does, that it is a matter of vital necessity to us that other countries should come round to the policy of the open door? Are we to attach no importance to the fact? I am taunted by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken with attaching no importance to the imports which come into Great Britain. There is no foundation for such a taunt, but if we are not only to accept the speeches made from hon. Members opposite, but to take note also of the reception with which certain remarks have met, we might say they think that exports from this country are of no value to this country. Look at the travesty of argument in which the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to indulge. It is a fact that the average value of the exports per head of this country has not risen in recent years. It is a fact that by comparison with other countries, if we look more particularly to the export of manufactured articles, we can show for this country no elasticity at all comparable with that which has been exhibited by other countries. It is a fact, if we look at the distribution of the exports from this country, that they are suffering because of hostile tariffs. That is asserted in the Blue-book to which so much reference has been made. Upon page 16 of that Blue-book occur the words—

> "There can be no doubt as to the effect of these hostile tariffs in checking the export trade of this country."

The right hon. Gentleman declares that in my opinion imports are of no value. I have never said anything of the kind. Imports are of enormous value. In that very speech at Edinburgh I took pride in the amount of our imports, but what I did say was that if the amount of our imports continued to increase that was no consolation for stagnation and lack of elasticity in our exports. I held then, and hold now, and the Government hold, that it is not wise to look only to returns from your investments abroad, and because they are great, and you are glad they are great, to take no account of this lack of rebound and lack of progress in your export trade. Then it is legitimate, holding that view — the view which has been announced only recently by the Duke of Devonshire, who said—to look for a remedy? Is the remedy which we advocate of too drastic a character for the difficulties with which this country is confronted? I recollect very well a significant criticism that was passed upon the late Lord Salisbury for having failed to protect the cotton trade of this country with Madagascar. At that time the value of our cotton exports to Madagascar fell in consequence of the French annexation from £116,000 to £6,000 worth. Lord Salisbury was criticised because that result had not been averted. How could it have been averted? By diplomatic representations? If they had failed the sanction in that case would be war. May not a similar object be sought by diplomatic negotiations, and must not those negotiations have a sanction—not the terrible sanction of war, but the sanction of imposing some duties upon imports from other countries which will make them realise that we are entitled to some consideration at their hands? I welcome this debate chiefly because it has revealed the fact that there is already a deep line of demarcation between hon. Gentlemen opposite and those of us who sit upon these Benches. What is their attitude towards the injuries which have been inflicted on the trade of this country, and what is their attitude towards the remedy we recommend to the country? Do they think it suitable to the occasion to call any Member who speaks from this Bench a protectionist if he recites the facts and the figures which could alone justify the pessimism of the right hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment? They avoid, except in the concluding words of the speech to which we have just listened, any criticism of the policy of the Government, and almost exclusively confine their attacks to the policy which has been promulgated by my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham. I was asked in a speech delivered this afternoon to state categorically what are my views on a 10 per cent. duty all round, or an average duty of 10 per cent, That is no part of the policy of the Government.

Sir, almost the only speech which has in the course of this debate been directed to attacking the policy of the Government was the speech, the very able and witty speech, of the hon. Member for Carnarvon. It opened with a coruscating shower of jests, but it was the only speech really delivered against the policy of the Government, and it was not a criticism of the speeches of those who have left the Government; but when he came to the policy of retaliation his objection to it was this. If you bring any pressure to bear on Germany, for instance, Germany will hit us back. We now suffer, without naming any particular country, from hostile tariffs ranging from 25 per cent. in the case of Germany to 75 per cent. in the case of the United States and 131 per cent. in the case of Russia. We suffer from these hostile tariffs. We are being hit by them; and are we to be told that we are to make no diplomatic representations on these points? The hon. Member concluded that part of his speech by saying that the protectionists are the funkers. What is to be said of those who will not stand up for the interests of their fellow-subjects against another Power? Here is Germany who will hit back, and, indeed, I scarcely exaggerate when I declare that we are being warned off even looking into the damage inflicted by these hostile tariffs lest we should be seized with the temptation to deal with them. We are not to inquire. We are not to hit back. This country, in fact, is to be cast in the dignified rôle of playing in a sort of combination between running the gauntlet and blind man's buff. We alone are to wear the bandage, and we are to accept the stripes. I agree that the policy of retaliation would be futile in the hands of hon. Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Carnarvon or right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I agree in that because we can very well forecast the way in which they would use such a weapon from the speeches they have made in the course of this debate and from the reception given by them to other speeches. When my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon said that retaliation was not theoretically unsound, there was not a cheer from the Opposition, and when he went on to declare that the tin-plate trade had been severely injured and for a time destroyed by hostile tariffs—dead silence. When he ventured to apply the epithet "barbarous" to a tariff of 131 per cent. ad valorem against the exports of this country an uneasy expression of dissent began to make itself heard on the Benches opposite; but when he, or, more notably, the right hon. Baronet who sits for Berwick, went on to explain at great length that negotiations for the purpose of securing greater advantages were extremely difficult, that retaliation was a perplexing, a forbidding policy, why then our political antagonists cheered up, and when the argument was developed, and we were told that, even if we surmounted those difficulties and did apply retaliation, we should inflict a greater injury on ourselves than on the nation with whom we were negotiating, then they burst into transports of joy. Therefore I am justified in saying that such a weapon would be a somewhat futile equipment in the hands of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, in order to show how difficult such a matter would be of accomplishment, stated that no Government would, or should, move any duty up or down—and I mark that—without the authority of Parliament. More than that, that it would not enter into any engagements to move a duty up or down without the authority of Parliament. Then does the right hon. Gentleman condemn the Cobden treaty? I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no Government ought to enter into any engagement which would end in putting a duty up or down without the authorisation of Parliament. Now that is a very important point, and I take it up because the question was put deliberately to me by the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last. Of course, a Government entering into diplomatic negotiations must be at liberty to state what it will do in certain events, but the treaty arrived at will be subject to the control of this House if the effective control of Parliament if the financial policy of this country is to be preserved. In the case of the Cobden treaty the negotiations took place in the year before—1859—and in the "Life of Mr. Gladstone" written by the right hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment we read that there was some perturbation in the Cabinet over this project of entering into negotiations for altering certain duties without the knowledge of Parliament. But these fears did not weigh with the Cabinet of the day and the treaty was concluded, and what was the result? Why, in, I think, Mr. Gladstone's words, France was persuaded to lower her duties on a number of articles of British production and export, and more especially on iron, which Cobden called the daily bread of other industries. If it was legitimate—and it was legitimate—in 1860 for the Cabinet without the knowlege of Parliament to enter into diplomatic relations with another country and to state that it was the policy of that Government to alter certain duties and thereby get a reduction of duties on articles of British production and export, is it illegitimate to-day to do the same thing? [HON. MEMBERS: "No"] It is not illegitimate. Then are we to understand that it was legitimate to repeal those duties and that it is not legitimate to say that unless you are met in a fair manner you will impose duties? Because that is what the policy of the Government proposes to do. We shall proceed with negotiations. I may say, in order to reply to the right. hon Gentleman, that negotiations are likely to be embarrassed if, before negotiation begins, Ministers are asked to state, step by step, all the arguments that will be used. Negotiations begin with nothing more than a bland smile and a warm welcome, and they are embarrassed if any further indications are given; and certainly, when I am speaking for a Government which believes in a policy of retaliation and intend to take up that policy in earnest, I shall not be drawn away by the questions of the right hon. Gentleman, and unfold to him an imaginative forecast of the exact language which Lord Lansdowne may or may not use in three or four years' time with this or that country.

Either the House trusts the Government or it does not trust the Government. This is not a speculative debate upon the comparative virtues of free trade and vices of protection. It is a vote of no confidence. We should be going very far in a debate on the Address in reply to the Gracious Speech from the Throne if we came down to the House and stated what a policy will include which is only going to be submitted to the country at the next general election. Sir, is it or is it not desirable that steps should be taken to abate the hostile tariffs which are imposed against the exports of this country? Is that a matter of real neccessity or is it not? A great many of us are in agreement, in closer agreement than some suppose, upon many aspects of this problem. We are all agreed that this country must import every year a great deal of food and a great deal of raw material. We are agreed, not so closely, but still very closely, that, in addition to the enormous money value of food and raw material, we must import into this country many appliances for saving labour and many half-manufactured articles and so forth, and that we must pay for these imports. How are we to pay for them? Very largely by our exports, if not wholly. Then we have to place our exports, and having placed these exports, being obliged by the very geographical peculiarities of this country to place these exports in order to get the imports, is it or is it not a cruel disadvantage to this country that outrageous tariffs should be imposed against them? I know there are fanatics in this matter. I know it, because there are some people who seem to think that a very high tariff is an advantage to the country against whose goods it is imposed—that it does so much harm to the country which puts it on as to be comparatively an advantage to the country on which it is imposed. We all know that the exporting country has to pay a certain amount of these duties. I have said there are some fanatics. Will they accept "Mill's Study of Political Economy" in a matter of that kind? He says those are right who say that a portion of an export duty is paid by the country bringing in the imports. That was his opinion, and that is the opinion of the Government. In any case, we believe that a tariff of 73 per cent., or 25 per cent., or 30 per cent. against the articles we must export places a tax on the whole of our community. It cuts down the profits of our manufacturers, and tends to lower the wages of the working classes. That is the reason, the first reason, which we advance for asking the country to authorise the resumption of freedom in our commercial negotiations. But we have a second reason, also announced by the Prime Minister, and that was that the sense of our helplessness was being borne in upon our minds in the face of any repetition of such a menace as that which was directed to Canada at the hands of the German Government.

We held, and we do hold, that the right of retalaition will prevent the repetition of any such menace. I have said what the policy of the Government includes. I was invited by my hon. friend the Member for Durham to define our policy not only inclusively but exclusively and not to make a rhetorical speech. no one will accuse me of doing that—but to give a straight answer to the straight question which he has put. Well, Sir, the policy of the Government does not include taxation for the mere purpose of fostering home industries which are subjected to legitimate competition. I am asked what about dumping. Is that legitimate competition? I am not going to make a speech about dumping, we know that it inflicts a severe injury upon many classes in this population, we know that beyond the injury it inflicts it aggravates the sense of injury; it aggravates the feeling of antagonism fomented throughout this country against the treatment which we receive from other countries, and we say, and we know, that the process of dumping is facilitated by the erection of high tariff walls, and therefore to those who complain, and naturally and legitimately complain, of dumping, we say that our remedy will bring them some redress, that if retaliation leads, as we believe it will lead, to the lowering of tariff walls, then the evil of dumping will also be mitigated. And I will say no more on the subject of large taxes imposed for the protection of manufacturers. It is not part of the policy of His Majesty's Government. The policy of the Government does not include a preferential system of trade with our colonies involving the taxation of food or raw material.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Does it exclude?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am not playing with words. I hear an hon. Gentleman say "What about the Colonial Secretary?" I am stating the position of the Government upon this matter, and I hold that the eloquent speech of my right hon. friend stands in no need of apology or of explanation. He says, as every man who has spoken from this Bench has said, that the policy of the Government did not include preferential trade with our Colonies involving taxation of food. This has been said by the Prime Minister again and again and by every one of his colleagues who has spoken from this Bench. But are Members therefore not at liberty to safeguard this country against the misinterpretation, for that is what it comes to? Having to define our policy I do deprecate the use of any language in this House which can be heard in our colonies and, above all, in Canada, to mean that we are insensible to what my right hon. friend the Member for West Bristol called the enormous value of the sentiment which underlies the idea of colonial preference. I deprecate the use of any such language, and I would even say to the right hon. Gentleman opposite that I was sorry to read his reference to the "so-called" preference in Canada. He ought not to look such a gift horse in the mouth.

MR. ASQUITH: I was quoting the language used by the late Colonial Secretary at the Conference.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am not aware that the late Colonial Secretary ever applied the phrase "so-called" to the Canadian preference, and what I refer to is the application of this epithet to the colonial preference, which I regret, and which is liable to be misinterpreted by Canada. That preference has been of great value to trade. Sir, not only do I deprecate the use of language which might be misunderstood in our Colonies, but I say that we should also use language which will avoid any chance of misapprehension here, and if such a course was legitimate in a Member of the House it is above all legitimate in a member of the Cabinet who is pledged to exclude colonial preference not only as a policy for this year but as a policy which it will submit to the country at the next election. I am not therefore to be drawn into attacks made upon my right hon. friend for the speech which he delivered. We are concerned to lay down a policy which the Government will propose before the next election; that is our duty, and if I may say so, our attitude towards colonial preference, and our attitude also consists in not including in the policy of the Government, but in avoiding any language which would give umbrage to colonial sentiment. Well, that Sir, again will bring us to the deep line of demarcation which now, as a rule, exists between the Benches opposite and these Benches. We do not make jokes and indulge in gibes about Imperial dumping; for my part if Canada places goods on our market in a manner that would be resented if so placed by another country; I would not look too curiously on that. I should distinguish between the blood relation and the keen business competitor. I should say that the methods of suasion which hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite advocate for all countries are appropriate methods for brother members in the British Empire; but that we at any rate, decline to regard the Colonies as in all matters upon exactly the same basis as foreign competitors. If we talk about the Throne and the Flag that is supposed to be high-falutin' and rhodomontade, but we have a Foreign Office for the Colonies as well as ourselves, an Army and Navy; is it not absurd to incur those heavy expenses for these common services, and then to say that in matters of trade you are only entitled to treat your colonies as foreign competitors? No preference to the Colonies involving taxation of food or of raw materials, but I hope now and ever in this country the warmest possible feeling towards the Colonies, the greatest gratitude for the sacrifice they have made in a common cause.

Time presses, but if I may I would come for a moment to the Amendment which is before us in order to consider its real import. I hope I have been right in stating the policy of the Government; I have stated it with all the amplitude which can reasonably be demanded of me, when I am dealing not with the details of a policy which is not before the House, but with the broad outline and direction of the policy which will be submitted to the country. I have stated it with all the precision that can be reasonably asked for if I am not to embarrass the course of future negotiation and discount the value of the sanction which may be obtained for that negotiation. Consider what this Amendment is. Its first proposition is a vote of censure dressed up to make that fact appear less apparent than it is. The second proposition is a historical judgment; very interesting I daresay to historical societies, but not so interesting to us. The third proposition is a statement of economic belief. We are not the Cobden Club. The first proposition and the first alone contains a censure; it throws upon us the onus of destroying and impairing the value of contributions which hon. Gentlemen would otherwise make to the discussion of the Budget which they have not seen and which they know on the word of the Prime Minister will deviate by not one jot from the settled condition and practice of the last quarter of a century. It is absurd to ask us to consider that Amendment in any other light than as a blow aimed at the heart of the Unionist Party. Let my hon. friends really gauge the proposal, which is a most ridiculous proposal; we are told that only one of two courses is consonant with the honour and dignity of His Majesty's Ministers; the first alternative course consistent with their honour and dignity is to embrace in their official policy all the views, no matter how divergent, which have been expressed by any members of their Party on contingencies which have not arisen and some of which cannot be foreseen; and the other alternative, apparently consistent with honour and dignity, is to take the one definite issue and then excommunicate by court-martial any member of their Party who holds views in excess of that policy, believing in the desirability and feasibility of issues which are beyond and outside the Government programme. Sir, if that is the advice we ought to take, its inherent absurdity is heightened when we consider the quarter from whence it comes. It is offered to us by the only political Party which, so far as I know in the whole political history of this country from the days of King Edward I., has tried both these policies; they tried the first—the policy of the inclusion of divergent and incompatible views—when they hammered together the Newcastle programme, and we know the result. The second policy of unnecessary prescription was tried during the later phases of the late South African War, and they are now during this debate thinking to escape from the consequences of that policy by the transparent device of this debating society Amendment.

We here as Ministers to-day accept, we endorse, we intend to prosecute, the Prime Minister's policy of resuming our freedom of commercial negotiation. We insist that this country, with the greatest trade of any country in the world—I admit it, I glory in it—should no longer suffer herself to be ignored in the reciprocal treaties made by foreign nations, to the material advantage of their commerce and at the sole expense of her own. Our leader is not here; I do not complain that our opponents have been so impetuous as to bring on this Motion in his absence; his presence is not necessary in order that a clear declaration may be made of the policy of the Government; but, as one of his followers who can speak for every colleague in the Administration in or out of the Cabinet, and speaking, I believe, at any rate for the great majority of those who, to use a time-worn phrase, "have acted with us" in recent years, in dark and difficult times during the war, in arduous Parliamentary struggles over the Education Bill—I say I believe the great majority of them will echo our leader's dictum, and so long as he will lead they will loyally follow. Though I have noted with party regret, and with infinite personal regret, that there are some Members on this side of the House who seem bent on action which may result in the irrevocable severance of ties which have long bound us and the obliteration of memories and obligations which we have all incurred in the service of a most kind, most candid, adroit, and courageous leader, who is not here to-night to speak for himself, the main body of the Unionist Party will, I believe, within the limits he has laid down, follow him in his fight for freer trade. I have not given way to a temptation to which many a man in my position might have yielded. I have not sought to prove there are no difficulties in the way of some of my hon. friends, but I do say that to my mind they are difficulties more apparent than real; no, I have stated the policy of the Government frankly, and have not disguised the fact that it involves a great departure—a great departure, not from the doctrines of free trade, but from the routine of Budget-making and the consequent futility of every diplomatic effort on behalf of the commerce of the country. The departure is a great one, great in itself and greater by contrast with the intrenched obstinacy of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Its magnitude may be measured by the rigidity of all, the pedantry of some, and the fanaticism of a few, who cling to every defect and disadvantage of a system, not of theoretic truth, but of empirical tradition never enjoined by the founders of free trade, and incompatible with the changing conditions of the world.

*Mr. REA (Gloucester) supported the Amendment as a "hardened and convicted" free importer, although he was connected with an industry which, if it was not yet to be numbered with the British industries that had gone, was one of those which, according to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, were going, viz., the distressful industry of British shipping. To the Liverpool shipowners the right hon. Gentleman described the condition to which it had been reduced, and he asked in anxious tones—

> "How long shall we keep it? How much shall we keep of it? Now my case is that British shipping, admirable as its condition is in many respects, is not progressing so fast as foreign shipping, and I do not like that symptom at all."

And what proof did the right hon. Gentleman give of his dismal description? The only official figures he quoted were these—that, while the tonnage of British ships had increased between 1890 and 1901 by 1,400,000, the tonnage of the rest of the world had increased by no less than 2,200,000. His case was that we had failed, not to hold our own, not that we failed to increase very greatly, but that in these years we had failed to accomplish so great an increase as that of the whole of the rest of the world put together. We had increased fourteen, and all the world beside us put together had increased twenty-two. Would this be a result to be ashamed of, if it were true even, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham stated it? But his figures required to be examined, for, though quite accurate, they were curiously misleading. In this single case the right hon. Gentleman suddenly substituted the whole British Empire for the United Kingdom. However much he might belittle these islands—he was not in the habit of speaking disrespectfully of the British Empire—but suddenly in this case he substituted the term "the whole British Empire" for the United Kingdom, and said, "the total increase in the tonnage of the whole British Empire was only 1,400,000." What would anyone who had heard or read those words understand, except that the United Kingdom was going under so fast that even her young and growing Colonies failed to keep her afloat? But why did the right hon. Gentleman substitute "British Empire" for "United Kingdom?" Looking at the figures only one reason could be seen, viz., that he wished to conceal the real progress of the shipping of our country. The truth, on the authority of that same Blue-book quoted by the right hon. Gentleman, was that the increase of tonnage of this country, the United Kingdom alone, was not less than 1,400,000, but actually 1,629,882, and that he had slipped into his account to our debit, by a sudden change of phrase, a loss of tonnage by Canada of 300,000 tons, caused by the decay of her wooden ships. Such was the fact. The shipping of this country had increased in the years mentioned, not by 1,400,000 tons, but by 1,629,882. Then to deal with the other figure; the ships of all the rest of the world had increased 2,200,000 tons. That by itself was not quite true. The increase in the rest of the world was not 2,200,000, but a little over 2,100,000 tons. That, however, was a small point. Of more importance was the fact that in those years a new maritime nation—Japan—had been born, and included in the tables for the first time. She had created a mercantile fleet of nearly a 1,000,000 tons, not out of legitimate commerce, but out of her national resources. Take out Japan, which was a phenomenon apart, and what did they find? Why, that all the States of Europe put together, with the United States of America thrown in, had increased their ocean-going shipping by only 1,200,000 tons, while we had increased ours by 1,600,000, or 30 per cent. more than the lot of them put together. He had not picked out any years such as the year of glorious memory, 1872. These years were of the right hon. Gentleman's own selection. And yet in the face of these facts, to be found in the very same page of the Blue-book, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham asked—

> "What is the use of saying that the house is still standing if you know that there is rot at the foundations? What is the use of saying we are doing very well, when you know we are doing comparatively worse every year?—when you know that behind you you have galloping up at a greater rate than anything you can command your bitterest and severest competitors and rivals?"

"Our bitterest and severest rivals!" How did we stand in relation to these? While our tonnage had increased by 1,600,000, that of France has not increased 200,000, and that of Italy by about the same amount. Norway, which, in the earlier year was the second largest ship-owning State, had decreased by 250,000 tons, and the United States of America by 50,000 tons. The only nation that could claim to be even a bad second to Great Britain was Germany, with her increase of 600,000 tons. Her increase was more than that of all the other countries put together. Why was this? Why was it that during the recent depression in Germany we were told by one of our Consuls that the shipbuilding industry was the last to suffer? The answer was that amid the arid desert of German protection the shipping and shipbuilding industry was a little oasis of free trade. Free imports for the German shipbuilder was the law. From the laying down of the keel to the launch, and from the launch to the trial trip, from the first steel plate and angle to the chronometer and the table napkins—everything for a ship was free in Germany. Germany, so far as shipping and shipbuilding were concerned, made the best of both worlds, the free trade world and the protectionist world. He had stated these facts not for the sake of vulgar boasting, but that the House might consider how the position of shipping would be affected by a policy of national and systematic retaliation—by a policy of protection. The light-hearted manner in which members and supporters of the Government talked of an avowed policy of systematic retaliation was, to his mind, simply astounding. A policy of retaliation must be directed first and foremost against the United States of America, because they were the greatest offenders in the matter of tariff, and because they were the largest exporters to this country. Retaliation not aimed at the United States would be a policy self-stultified. But this was a game in which all the trumps were in the hands of the other party—for the simple reason that America could live very comfortably without us, but we could not live without her. How would America meet any act she considered hostile? We were not left in doubt; her weapon was already forged and tempered, and it was directed against British shipping. Revised Statute 2,502, passed by Congress on 27th August, 1894 (Section 14), was as follows—

> "A discriminating duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed by law, shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, or merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States; but this discriminating duty shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be imported in vessels not of the United States, entitled by treaty or any Act of Congress to be entered in the ports of the United States on payment of the same duties as shall then be paid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported in vessels of the United States."

We were at present in the position of being entitled by treaty to most-favoured-nation treatment. But if those relations were altered this provision would automatically come into play.

And, it being half-past Seven of the clock, the debate stood adjourned till this Evening's Sitting.

EVENING SITTING.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [8th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

Which Amendment was—

> "At the end of the Question, to add the words. 'But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers. We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being.'"—(Mr. John Morley.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR. REA, continuing his speech, said—If we began a tariff war by an act, not of a general tariff, but of special retaliation, automatically the shipping interest must suffer. Who would in such circumstances send goods to America in a British ship, if a French, or German, or Italian, or Norwegian could be obtained? A blow at British shipping was the most obvious, the easiest, the least dislocating to the strikers of any available. In any tariff war, it might be taken as certain, in his opinion, that the shipping trade, like Uriah of old, would be put in the front of the battle. But if a policy of retaliation threatened danger to shipping, a policy of protection would be its ruin. What had built up this trade to be the most important and valuable branch of our commercial activities? Doubtless coal mining employed more men, and our railways had a capital more than five times as great as that invested in ships, but the annual gross earnings of our mercantile marine were about equal to the gross earnings of all our railways put together, which amounted to £106,000,000 in 1902; and considerably more than the value of the total product of our largest manufacture—cotton—which was estimated at £90,000,000. What had built up this great trade? He did not underestimate the energy and genius of the many distinguished men who had contributed to erect this imposing structure, or the national aptitude of our race, and our character, as an island people, but, after all, we were not quite so superior to the rest of the world in energy and enterprise and education as we are in shipping tonnage. There must be other and special causes for this extraordinary and overwhelming superiority in a trade which all nations of the earth most desire. In his opinion, there was not one cause only, but two, that had contributed to it equally. First, our own free-trade policy, and second, but not less, the protectionist policy of our neighbours. They had flung away their chances of competing with us on equal terms on the open ocean, where we were all equal. It was the foreign tariffs of other nations that had checked our exports of what protectionists called our staple manufactures, and forced us to send them their payments for our imports, and forced them, by the operation of the inflexible laws that govern the international exchange of products, and the financial laws that governed foreign exchange, to receive payment for their goods so largely in the form of the services of our ships. He did not think it was we who suffered most from the substitution. No intelligent English shipowner, looking at the question from the selfish interest of his craft, could favour a return to a policy of protection for ourselves, however much he might desire other nations to continue in the error of their ways. He believed in a theory which the Prime Minister described as—

> "So perverse that it is impossible that any human being can hold it."

A theory, which, if he had been in the House during this debate, he would have found, to his surprise, to be largely held by free-traders on both sides of the House. The theory was this, that we, a free-trade nation, surrounded by protectionist nations, had so adapted ourselves to our protectionist environment, that we actually thrive in it. This he believed to be our case. He believed American and German protection to be bad for the world at large; and, in their present advanced industrial conditions, at any rate, to be bad for America and Germany in particular; but he was by no means sure they were bad for this country in particular.

MR. GUEST (Plymouth) said he should have distrusted this policy much less if it had been put forward by the Board of Trade instead of by the Colonial Office. He had not been convinced either by the idealism of the Colonial Secretary or the realism of the Secretary to the Board of Trade, and he believed it was possible to take a saner and more humane view of our Imperial destiny than that taken by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. They had had from the President of the Board of Trade and the Chief Secretary for Ireland two remarkable speeches, which appeared to him to be encouraging. But it must be apparent to everybody that there was a very grave discrepancy between those two speeches and the performance of the Government. The President of the Board of Trade declared, in plain and well-advised language, that the Government were prepared to fight for free trade, and if that were so the right hon. Member for West Birmingham must be their most formidable antagonist. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had in almost identical terms described the policy of the Government. Yet at the present moment the official candidate for the South Birmingham vacancy was a declared supporter of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. The voice of the Government was the voice of Jacob, the hand was the hand of Esau. The Prime Minister had been more concerned in preparing a formula which it was more difficult for people not to follow than otherwise. That formula was retaliation. It did very well till subjected to examination, and nobody would disagree with him when he said that retaliation for freedom of negotiation meant two very different things to a free-trader and a protectionist. What had to be decided now was whether the next Administration which sat upon the Government Bench was to be a free-trade or protectionist Administration, and on that point no assurance had been given. In the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland there was still the old evasion of the question and the old refusal to indicate how far the Government intended to go. Then there was the benevolent neutrality of the Government which allowed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to pursue his campaign through the country. Last year all discussion on this subject was discouraged, and they were the victims of a conspiracy of silence. This year they had been the victims of a conspiracy of ambiguity. He supposed that the real object of the Government was to remain as long as possible in office, and he could quite understand a Government stooping to conquer, but he was very doubtful if they could conquer, however low they stooped in this case. The Unionist Party considered this question to be of first-rate importance, and the statement of the Government had neither convinced nor satisfied the free-trade element, nor did he suppose that the protectionists had derived much satisfaction from them. Those who heard the speech of his honourable colleague the Member for Plymouth on the previous Friday, would not say that the Government had been successful in gratifying the protectionist section of their supporters. His honourable colleague was one of the most strenuous as he was one of the most important supporters of the Birmingham policy, and he himself was quite as strenuous a free-trader. If he went into the lobby with the Government he would be regarded as a loyal supporter of the Government, and would be entitled to their support at the next general election, as also would his honourable colleague. No two opinions could be more dissimiliar than his and his colleague's on this occasion, and yet observe what was to be the result. Both of them were to appear before the same electors, were to be supported by the Government, and were to have their benediction and support to the bewilderment of, he thought he might say, a disgusted electorate. Surely by this time the Government had the courage to take one side or the other. They could understand the position of Mr. Chamberlain. He differed from the right hon. Gentleman, and disliked many of his methods, but he could respect him and also hon. Members who had supported him through thick and thin, and stuck to him and the policy he had enunciated. But as for the Government, it seemed to him they gave very little material for respect. The Party was being driven into protection, many members of it quite unconsciously; but whether they knew it or not, this policy of shift, evasion, and dexterous manipulation would carry them into the troublous seas of protection. There was no place for the Unionist free importer, and the time would not be far distant when there was not room in the Party for the Unionist negotiator, and it was possible the time might come when even Imperial preference was looked upon askance, and the Imperial preferentialist was regarded as something of the nature of a suspect by the members of the Tariff Commission. The Conservative Party was going through the process of voluntary liquidation. The business was being taken up by another syndicate, who had become possessed of the goodwill of the business and were quite prepared to cut the losses involved in the transaction. Surely, under the influence of protection, the Party must change its character, and the policy of the new Conservative Party would be such as his noble friend scarcely recognised, or perhaps cared to recognise.

He did not want to make too much of the apprehension which had been suggested as to the evil influences of corruption through protection, but it would not be wise to entirely ignore the influence of that factor. The corruption depended almost entirely upon the composition of the House. Now he wondered whether hon. Members had considered how far the composition of the Party was likely to be altered by the introduction of this new element. Protectionists had spoken in terms which they were bound to recognise as honest opinions, but how long would they remain when this new condition of affairs was introduced into the House? How long would they survive the introduction of the professional lobbyist? What position would the old-fashioned politician of to-day find himself in when the necessity for having a distinct representative would have forced business interests to get represented by some individual as their exclusive nominee? Corruption would follow in the wake of protection—it was not the Corrupt Practices Act which mainly guaranteed the purity of that Assembly, seats were not bought now for many reasons, but largely because they were not worth buying. It had come to his personal knowledge, however, that already manufacturing interests were on the look-out for suitable gentlemen, whose election expenses they offered to pay, if they would act as the direct representatives of their trades. What was the position of the free food Party with regard to all this? He did not know whether the Opposition had been congratulating themselves upon the division which existed in the Ministerial ranks. The Prime Minister had been quite unable to get his supporters into line, and they had already grouped themselves into Parties. Observe what an admirable instrument this was for recruiting. Those who were bold-hearted protectionists would enlist under the banner of the right hon. gentleman the member for West Birmingham; those who were merely Party men would meekly follow the Prime Minister; and those entertaining honest doubts might join with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. If ever there was an occasion when they could say, "He that is not with us is against us," it was the present. He saw no alternative but to vote for the Amendment. He had no confidence in the Government, no confidence either in their intentions or their ability to check the protectionist movement, which he believed was fraught with danger to the country, and which would throw into the melting pot of chance the prospects of millions of people who had under our present system prospered and thriven. He did not see in the speeches of any member of the Government any determination to meet the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Believing, as he did, that that policy would be disastrous to the welfare of this country, he had no alternative course but to vote in favour of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

Mr. CHARLES McARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange) said he could not quite agree with what the hon. Member had said in regard to the speech made by his right hon. friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He had listened to that speech with very great attention, and it seemed to him a clear and straightforward statement of the policy of the Government. Upon the first day of this debate the President of the Board of Trade made an equally explicit statement, and he told them that the policy of the Government was not a policy of protection but a policy of free trade. He further stated that the Government disavowed altogether the policy associated with the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and he took that programme in detail and showed that the Government did not entertain it, and he also disavowed colonial preference and taxes on food. Although it was true that since the speech of the President of the Board of Trade various members of the Government had to some extent weakened their confidence in the thorough adherence of the Cabinet to the policy then enunciated, yet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had now re-echoed the assurances of the President of the Board of Trade. He himself was prepared to support the policy of the Government if they would honestly carry out their own policy. But there was a serious difference between the words of the Government and their actions. He objected to the way in which the Government had allowed the affairs of the country to drift. He had full confidence in their captain, but who and where was the pilot? A captain who for want of a pilot allowed his ship to drift on the rocks was guilty not merely of negligence but of barratry.

Alluding to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, he expressed the opinion that they were in danger of sacrificing the national ideal of freedom of thought, freedom of conscience, and freedom of trade, to what he would call a blatant Imperialism. There were two kinds of Imperialism, one true and the other false, one genuine and the other spurious. If by Imperialism they understood the spreading abroad of their dominions in the world with the object of elevating the lower races and spreading abroad the benefits of good government and granting the people self-government, that was an idea of Imperialism with which he thoroughly agreed, because it was one calculated to benefit the world. If on the other hand Imperialism meant mere pride in the power of a nation, a mere lust for dominion and a desire to obtain authority over other nations, and to exploit them for our own advantage and for the purpose of building up tariff walls around them, that was an Imperialism which he thought was not desirable. His hon. friend had made a violent attack upon the Free Food League. He was not surprised that objection should be taken to the title of "The Free Food League," because it drew attention to the most objectionable, the most odious feature of the programme, with which the right hon. Gentleman was associated—the taxation of the poor man's bread. MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] He was quite aware that it had been stated that the proposed taxes on food would be so counteracted by remissions of taxation on other articles that it would not increase the cost of living. If they had a guarantee that the tax would not exceed what was originally proposed he did not think it would affect the well paid artisan, but it would press severely upon the poorest of the poor. But what guarantee had they that such taxes would not be increased. Look at the experience of other nations and they would conclude that it was only reasonable to suppose that taxes on food would be increased. They had heard various inducements put forward for the adoption of this policy. The first time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham brought forward his policy in this House he covered it with the promise of old-age pensions. What had become of old-age pensions now. The next thing was that this policy would cause a rise in wages, but they heard nothing about that now. Then another inducement was the prospect of more employment, but what was that prospect based upon? It depended entirely upon the transfer of a proportion of the employment of the country from one class to another. The ex-Colonial Secretary in his speeches had often pointed to the large amount of foreign manufactures imported into this country, and had asked why those goods should not be made in England. It seemed to him that this policy, in holding out the prospect of greater employment, which merely meant the transfer of a portion of employment from one class to another, evoked a very low moral tone and appealed to the baser instincts of humanity—greed, covetousness, and combativeness. [MINISTERIAL cries of "No."] What would become of shipping trade if this policy were carried out? It meant taking bread out of the mouths of the sailors, the railway men, and the dockers in order to put more into the mouths of another section of the community. The grievances attaching to the shipping trade could be rectified altogether apart from the policy of the ex-Colonial Secretary, for if that policy were adopted they would have to pay more for building and working their ships, and there would be less traffic for them to carry. He knew there were many shipowners in Liverpool who agreed with the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, but he disagreed with that policy.

Although he was an ardent believer in free trade, he acknowledged that a free-trade policy had its dangers. There could be no doubt that some of our industries were suffering from the system of free imports. Even our shipping industry which appeared prosperous was really not so prosperous. It was suffering severely from foreign competition, and our sailing ships to-day were being driven from the seas by vessels owned in foreign countries. Although the Foreign Secretary could protest against the present condition of things in regard to tariffs he could do nothing because he had no weapon. When one man came up after another and said that his trade was suffering from foreign competition he thought something must be done to improve the situation. The reason why the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had acquired such influence in the country was not so much through agreement with his plan as by the people's confidence in the man himself. He said that, although he believed his plan was thoroughly unsound, he acknowledged that free trade had its limitations and its dangers. It was quite possible for a free-trade country to be crippled or even ruined under free trade, either by its industries being taken away in detail by aggressive taxation on the part of foreign competitors or by such a restriction of the area of competition that free trade had no room to operate. Our trade, he believed, was suffering from both these causes. The country wanted the power to put its foot down and to say, "We are unfairly treated." Everybody was a consumer, but the consumer was not everybody. He was not prepared to vote for the Amendment, for the Government had no desire to return to protection, and they disavowed their intention of taxing food.

*MR. THEODORE TAYLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe) said the question was frequently asked what we were to do for markets if our chief customer shut their ports against us by means of tariffs, as Russia and the United States were doing at the present time. If anyone took the trouble to examine the figures he would find that the two great excluding countries still imported a large amount of manufactures. He ventured to say that if, under any conceivable circumstances, if all the manufacturing nations of the world had a tariff as high as that of Russia, there would still be a large total of imported manufactures. The country which had the advantage of free imports, and, as a consequence, of cheap production, would still do the lion's share of the trade, and an increasing proportion of it. He spoke as a practical manufacturer who had his living to get in competition with German "dumping" in cloth. He was a member of a Yorkshire firm of manufacturers, in the fourth generation, which lost its trade with America in 1864 owing to the Morell tariff, and after that acquired a trade with Germany, France, and Italy. They did a large German trade from 1866 to 1879, when the Bismarck tariff very largely closed it. [Cheers.] He would tell the Gentlemen who cheered something still worse. If ever there was a trade where there seemed to be a very good case for the protection now unblushingly advocated it was the woollen trade, because the imposition of the German tariff not only made Yorkshire manufacturers lose the German market, but by 1890 they had to compete in the English market with cloth made in Germany by means of English machinery and imported English foremen. But the Yorkshire manufacturers had been accustomed to make their own profits and not to look to the Government for them, and so instead of shutting down their mills they thought they would try self-protection rather than Government protection. His firm were manufacturers of cloth both for men's and women's wear. One of the very remarkable things about the woollen and other textile trades was that, whereas in men's wear the foreigners hardly made any headway at all in the English market, they did so in regard to women's wear. Some manufacturers knowing that fact thought that probably there was something more than mere protection to account for the German gaining our market here. If it had been protection only in his own country he would have exported cloth for men's wear to this country. Men wanted durability in their cloth, but he would ask hon. Members who had wives and daughters whether durability was liked by them when they got it. The reason for women being less desirous of durability in dress was quite clear. Women's fashions varied very much, and men's not so much. As an English manufacturer he was sorry to say that manufacturers in this country had not followed the trend of fashion so closely as they ought to have done. The manufacturers of this country had at their back the best labour, English labour, in the world, they had the further advantage of free access to raw material, and the workers had shorter hours of labour; and under these circumstances they had asked themselves whether it was not possible for English manufacturers to retain their own markets? In his own particular firm they had adopted the principle of profit-sharing, which he believed to be a great help in this matter. He agreed with Mr. Carnegie that they could not have the best brains of workers if they had not got their hearts. His firm, by improved machinery, by co-operation with the workmen, enlisting their enthusiasm, putting it to them not merely as a matter of personal interest, but patriotism, had succeeded. Six or eight years ago large buyers of cloth for mantle purposes in the English market used to look at German manufacturers' patterns first and those of the English afterwards. Now they looked at the English patterns first, and the Germans got the leavings which the English used to get.

What did retaliation mean? It meant that we were to get foreign nations to give us better terms. Had we the slightest hope of permanently compelling other nations to give our manufacturers better terms in order that we might compete against them? He did not believe any policy could be well founded which was not founded on an intelligent appreciation of self-interest. He for one did not sneer at Canadian preference. He appreciated it as beneficial to the colony and also to us, but it was an approach to free trade and not to protection. Our industry was not in a sound condition if our business depended upon preferences. The best way to command trade was to give good value. As to the argument of the Secretary of the Board of Trade on "dumping" it could only be effectively done by a perfect trade combine consisting of several separate works. And any such combine would prefer to close the more obsolete and unremunerative of such works rather than carry them on in order to "dump" on the foreigner at an enormous loss. That was what was actually taking place at that moment in the case of the United States Steel Trust, and other American iron manufacturers. It had been said that cotton would never be taxed. It had been taxed, and he showed a brass tag which had been inserted in bales of cotton in the United States, which showed that it was not against the Constitution of certain individual States to levy a duty on cotton. But if there was a Constitutional difficulty about imposing an export tax on cotton in the United States, could it be imagined that the great American nation would not amend its Constitution for the purpose of striking at this country in retaliation for import duties we might impose? He spoke as a Lancashire Member, and he had noticed that no hon. Gentleman engaged in the cotton manufacture had got up and advocated a policy which would be the ruin of Lancashire. On the faith of Mr. Macara, the President of the Cotton Spinners' Association, he could state that 80 per cent of their production went abroad. Even a small protective duty would mean ruin for the cotton industry of Lancashire and Yorkshire; it would be a bad thing for every trade in the country, and, above all, it would be worse for the poorest of the people, whom the House of Commons ought to be the first to protect.

SIR WALTER THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk) said he had been struck in the course of this debate by the comparative absence of hon. Members representing constituencies affected by foreign tariffs taking part in it. They had had a great deal of argument against the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, but practically nothing against the policy of the Government. There had been any amount of theoretical argument, but he had a strong opinion that practical experience was worth more than theoretical argument. He had the misfortune to be connected with two industries, both of which had suffered at the hands of the foreigners. He referred to the sugar trade and the woollen trade. Last year he had spoken on the sugar bounty question when the Sugar Convention Bill was before the House; now he intended to discuss the condition of the woollen trade as affected by hostile tariffs. Some months before the speech delivered by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham against foreign hostile tariffs, he had made a speech to his constituents, in which he pointed out that these foreign tariffs were practically sapping the export of woollen goods from this country, and that the Government, whether Conservative, Unionist, or Liberal, would some day be compelled to take up the question and deal with it. He said also that he trusted the question would be approached free from Party. He had likewise expressed the hope that the matter would be dealt with by diplomatic means in the first instance, but that if all efforts by diplomacy failed he was prepared to retaliate. He still hoped that if the Government were empowered to negotiate a modification of hostile tariffs might be attained without resorting to retaliation, and he might mention that one effect of the agitation in this country had been to stop the new Tariff Bill which was to have come into operation in Germany this year. That was a great achievement. High foreign tariffs had had a serious effect upon the woollen trade in this country. The productive power of the woollen trade in Great Britain was much in excess of the home consumption, and therefore any falling off in the exports of woollens abroad was a serious matter for the manufacturers to face. The flood-tide of the woollen export trade in this country was between 1870 and 1880 when the exports amounted to nearly £29,000,000, but they had now fallen to little over £9,000,000 of woollen fabrics alone. The imports of woollen goods in the period to which he referred only amounted to £3,000,000; they had now risen to £13,000,000, including £3,000,000 worth of yarns. The tariffs in America were so high that they practically excluded all British manufactures of woollen goods, and other European countries had teadily increased their protective tariffs against us except the decaying country of Turkey, where the import duty was only 8 per cent. Formerly we had done an enormous trade in woollen goods with France, Germany, and the United States. The trade with America was practically dead, and that with France and Germany was declining. Another test of the decline in the woollen trade in Scotland was the decrease in the number of people employed in the woollen factories, which had fallen from 40,000 to 25,000, and a much worse state of matters would have been shown but for some very considerable Government contracts for army clothing which had been secured by Border manufacturers in the past three or four years. Preferential tariffs had been given by Canada, and as a result our exports to that colony had increased by 50 per cent. New Zealand and the Cape had likewise passed Acts giving the mother country a preference. The result as regards Cape Colony was encouraging, for certain foreign manufacturers doing a Cape trade found themselves compelled to establish works in this country to enjoy the preference. This was satisfactory inasmuch as our workpeople would enjoy employment, and we should not grudge the masters carrying their profits to spend abroad if so disposed. He had neither joined the Tariff Reform League nor the Free Food League, and consequently might be considered an independent witness, and he must cordially, free trader as he had always been, support the policy of the Government, which, in his opinion, would make so-called free trade freer.

*MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): My intervention in this debate for a very few moments is not prompted by any desire to take part in the controversy as between free trade and protection. On the contrary, my object in intervening is to make clear that in the action which the Irish Members intend to take they decline absolutely to commit themselves, at this stage, on one side of the controversy or the other. Were it otherwise, if I had to make up my mind on the merits of the question before the House, I should be in great difficulty, because I do not know what the policy of the Government is, and I do not know what a vote given in their favour to-night would mean —whether it would mean a vote in favour of protection pure and simple, or some sort of colonial preference, or some vague thing called a power of retaliation, which so far as I know resides in the House at the present moment, and which, I believe, this House can never alienate from it. On the other hand, when I consider the merits of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Montrose, I should find it impossible as as Irishman to subscribe to the statement contained in it that—

> "The removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population."

I presume that Ireland is included in the phrase "the realm," and so far as Ireland is concerned I respectfully state that in my judgment that statement is historically untrue. Ireland has unfortunately in the past suffered equally from the protective and from the free-trade policy of Great Britain. It is impossible to conceive anything more disgraceful, more shameful, than the story of the deliberate destruction of Irish industries by the action of the British Parliament. I remember a famous speech made by the present Prime Minister in 1895 in which he said that many of the ills of Ireland sprang from her poverty, and that England and Scotland were largely responsible for that poverty. In those days, before the introduction of steam, Ireland was in truth a formidable rival to Great Britain in commerce and manufactures, and in his great work Mr. Froude said—

> "The mere rumour of a rise of industries in Ireland created a panic in commercial circles in England, and the commercial leaders in England were possessed with a terror of the Irish rivalry which could not be exorcised, and again and again the British manufacturers came together and petitioned the British Parliament to save them from the rivalry of Irish manufacturers."

And finally this Parliament listened to their voice, and when they did take action it certainly was thorough. Mr. Lecky had pointed out in his book that the Navigation Laws prohibited the importation of Irish cattle into England as "a public and common nuisance;" Irish beef, pork, bacon, butter, and cheese were all excluded, and he growth of the great woollen trade was the direct result of these restrictions of trade. That trade in turn was exterminated by the action of the British Parliament. The export of wool and woollen goods from Ireland was prohibited under pain of forfeiture of the goods and ships and a fine of £500 for every offence under a Statute of William III.; the Irish cotton trade had been ruined by a Statute of George II., and was killed by a protective duty in England of 25 per cent. At one time Ireland supplied all the cloth for the sails of the British Navy. An end was put to it by imposing duties upon all Irish-made sail cloth; and so with all Irish products of that day, and the result is summed up in these words, which I will read from Mr. Froude, who was not a witness very friendly to Ireland. "England," he said—

"Governed for what she deemed in her own interest, making her calculations in the gross balance of her trade ledgers, and leaving her moral obligations to accumulate as if right and wrong had been blotted out of the Statute-book of the universe. England determined to keep Ireland poor and miserable as the readiest means to prevent her from being troublesome. She destroyed her shipping industry by her trade navigation laws. She extinguished Irish manufactures by preferential duties. She laid disabilities even upon its wretched agriculture, for fear Irish importation might injure the English farmers. With their shipping destroyed by the Navigation Acts, their woollen manufactures taken from them, their trade in all its branches crippled, the only resource left to those of the Irish who cherished dreams of improving their unfortunate country was agriculture."

So the whole Irish nation was driven back upon agriculture; and then, having destroyed Irish industries by your protection policy, and having driven the whole nation back upon agriculture, then you stepped in with your free trade policy to complete our ruin. Mr. Speaker, I do not question for a moment the truth of the statement that for this country free trade at the time it was established was a blessing, and has conduced to the welfare and prosperity of the people of Great Britain. [OPPOSITION Cheers.] But, Sir, free trade came to Ireland in a different guise. It brought to Ireland all its disadvantages, and brought to Ireland none of its boons. [MINISTERIAL Cheers.] A good free trader and a good Liberal, the late Mr. Childers said, in his draft report of the Financial Relations Commission of 1895—

he said,

"in financial policy is usually considered to have been advantageous to a population, the great bulk of which had come to depend not upon agriculture, but on manufacturing industries and commerce. But it is evident this change was not advantageous to Ireland, a country in which there was little trade or manufacturing industry; and it must be said that just as Ireland suffered in the last century from protection and the exclusive commercial policy, so has she been at a disadvantage in this century from the adoption from the almost unqualified free trade policy in the United Kingdom."

Now, I say, under these circumstances, it is no wonder there is a state of apathy and indifference on this subject in Ireland. The spectacle presented by Ireland at this moment is very strange. She is an integral portion, so you say, of this Empire. She is supposed to have common interest with the Empire. Well, Sir, this country is ringing from end to end with this great fiscal controversy. It is the topic of conversation in the Senate and in the street. Go to Ireland and to-day it is the one topic no one is talking about. There is no interest at this moment taken in the question in Ireland at all. Ireland might as well be portion of any other Empire as of this, so far as interest in this question is concerned. So you may as well find yourself in Iceland as Ireland, so far as this quesion goes. The last line ever written before his death by Swift seems to me to express pretty well the views of the Irish people when to-day they are told they are to get a tariff for the protection of Irish goods. Swift was driving through the Phœnix Park just before his death, and he there saw a large number of workmen employed building a great powder magazine, and he wrote when he went back the following lines—

> "Behold the proof of Irish sense,
> Here Irish wit is seen,
> When nothing's left that's worth defence

We have been told that Irish prosperity will revive if only a tax is put upon food, and that Irish industries will spring up again if only a tariff is put upon foreign imported articles, but we are somewhat sceptical about that in Ireland. A far more important question in Ireland is that of transit. Irish industries are strangled and destroyed by the expense of transit and the absence of facilities for transit. Transit in Ireland costs from 30 to 35 per cent. more than in Scotland and England. When the people of Ireland talked of protection they have in their minds protection against England. It is not Germany or any foreign nation but England which is the great dumper in Ireland. For such reasons public opinion in Ireland to-day is apathetic and unformed upon the situation which has arisen. For these reasons my colleagues and I refuse to commit ourselves, at this stage at any rate, upon one side or the other of this controversy. We prefer to hold ourselves in reserve and to await developments. I put this to the House of Commons. What a strange result it would be of the British refusal of Home Rule if the ultimate decision of this vast question should be dominated by the votes of a body of men who are in this House, but not of it, and who, in casting their votes, will refuse to think Imperially, but will be actuated by the sole consideration which course will conduce most speedily to the freedom and happiness of Ireland? There is one consideration which relieves me of any difficulty as to how I should vote on this occasion. The Amendment is, above all, a vote of want of confidence in the Government, and as that alone I regard it. The Irish Party has no confidence in the Government. Not only has the Government recently betrayed its solemn pledges to Ireland on the question of University education, but it has opposed an absolute non possumus to Ireland's claim for self-government. I say that no English Government which denies Ireland's claim for self-government can possess the confidence of the Irish Nationalists in the House. Upon this broad ground, and reserving full freedom of action in future developments in this fiscal controversy, my friends and I will vote to-night in favour of a Motion of want of confidence in the Government.

*SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): We are now coming close to the conclusion of a debate of which I will say that it has probably been more interesting and certainly more remarkable in its circumstances than any debate which any one present can have listened to on a subject of the greatest, of vital and pressing, importance to the interests of the country—importance so vital and so pressing that it was necessary for my right hon. friend to move at the earliest possible moment of the session the Amendment to the Address which we have been discussing. It is often said and urged in the Press and elsewhere that this debate ought not to have been raised in the absence of the Prime Minister, and I think it well, as that contention goes deeper than may appear at first sight, at once to dispose of that objection. I need hardly repeat what I have already said from this place—how deeply we regret the right hon. Gentleman's absence and how cordially we hope that we may soon see him again among us all in his usual vigour and strength. But if we come to estimate the loss which his absence has inflicted on the House and on different parts of the House I am not sure that we of the Opposition have not suffered more than the Party or Parties opposite. It appears as if some persons have been learning rather too quickly their lesson, and have begun to think Imperially in the more evil domestic sense of the word Imperially. We live in this old country of ours—as yet at all events we live—under a constitutional system and not under an Imperial system. The Prime Minister of this country is, after all, as his name implies, a Minister; he is not the Chancellor of the British Empire, or even of these islands. He has colleagues who know his mind, who have assisted in framing their common policy, who share his responsibility. Am I to be told that no one of them is equal to the task of expounding what that policy is? Why, the theory will not stand for a moment. This Legislature is composed of two Houses, and in the House of Lords it has recently been the late President of the Council—it is now the Foreign Secretary—who speaks the mind of the Prime Minister and his Government, and expounds not only to that House but to the country and to all of us their policy. They find no difficulty in discharging that duty, whether on some intricate and critical question of foreign policy or as to some minor detail in an unimportant Bill. Further than that, down to a year and a half ago the great statesman who was Prime Minister of the country was not a member of this House, and the duty of being his mouthpiece was most perfectly discharged by the right hon. Gentleman who is now at the head of the Government.

The idea that the Government, when the Prime Minister is absent, are smitten with a sort of aphasia and are not able to speak for themselves is absurd. But there is more than this, Sir. This subject has been for months before the country, absorbing its interest almost to the exclusion of everything else. We have all of us been reading and thinking and talking about it until we are hardly able to think and read and talk of anything else. Nay, more. For the instruction of the Government, so we are told, an inquiry was directed, and the result of that has been published. There is no doubt or ambiguity whatever as to the attitude and opinion of the Opposition. There is almost as little doubt as to the purpose of that policy which I think, to avoid circumlocution, I may call the Birmingham policy. I suppose I may use that phrase without giving offence to other places, for Sleaford and Sheffield follow cheerfully in Birmingham's train. Besides that, the right hon. Gentleman has surrounded himself with a specially chosen Cabinet. He has put away from among them the unclean thing, and the unclean thing is now sitting below the gangway. This modern Gideon, like his great prototype, has chosen to serve with him those only who lap with their tongue, though I should not be candid if I did not say that some of them seem to me sometimes to overlap with their tongue. With all the time they have had for becoming familiar with their own policy, and having been selected for their solidity and fidelity, it is inconceivable that any one can say that they are dependent on the Prime Minister to tell us what their policy is. But how absurd it would have been if, on this plea of the illness of the Prime Minister or any other, we had been content to remain silent and inert and to abdicate our functions. We were shut out from the discharge of those functions last summer by the tactics of the Government. We must not allow ourselves to be any longer silent. We must take our part in this House in pronouncing judgment on the matter before the country, and we must not leave it altogether to the electors. We are constantly being reminded that, after all, we are not the only jury called upon to give a decision in this matter. Another discussion, debate, and decision is proceeding sporadically and intermittently through the country. I referred on the opening night of the session to the extraordinary series of by-elections which has taken place; but during the last few days there has been given the most striking, significant, and reverberating decision of them all in a district peculiarly favourable to the Government, with political traditions and personal attachments all in their favour, in a constituency of well-to-do residents and of industries that have been sorely pressed by foreign competition. Where can you find any place in the kingdom where the Government were more likely to get their own way? I am only surprised, and I say so openly, that men who have the ordinary feeling and consideration for their own dignity and self-respect can remain disregardful of such a result. We have known a great Government, a powerful Government with a large majority, which, on the occurrence of a conspicuous proof that there was a revulsion of feeling against them in the country, did not hesitate to put their fate to the test, and win or lose it all. Of course, there are various Governments with varying standards of conduct. What I want to know is—Is there an official policy capable of being reduced to practice and of being expressed in intelligible English? If there is, why do not they produce it? They say it is for the country and not for Parliament or this House to have this policy explained to them. When the country has been consulted and given its mandate—then, and not until then, the information will be given. This much we have gathered from the debate.

Sir, the situation has no parallel. According to the chief Whip of the Government, there will be no general election this year or next. The Leaders of the Party find the trade of the country in such a position that they have decided that it is necessary to "reverse, annul, and delete" the fundamental canons of free trade. The Prime Minister has said so. The Minister who has been for eight years at the Colonial Office, and who, in the unanimous opinion of his colleagues, is the greatest Imperial figure of this or any age, has gone into the wilderness in order to avert, if he can, the dissolution of the Empire. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, not unconnected with him, bids us beware lest the history of the loss of the American colonies is repeated; and all these signs and portents and convulsions which have startled and alarmed the country we are now asked to believe involve nothing more than the assertion of a high-sounding but nonsensical proposition about the resumption of freedom of negotiations. Was there ever such an anticlimax in our political history? If the Prime Minister on 3rd October was able to tell the Duke of Devonshire, as he did tell him, that he saw no difficulty in carrying out the policy by the help of his newly-constructed Government, what has happened since then? To be in possession of a policy which must not be disclosed, which must not be put in operation, while circumstances are clamouring for action, seems to imply that Ministers have only a half-belief in their own policy or else they dread that its reception would not be favourable. Otherwise, why should not some beginning at least have been made before the distant date of the general election—some beginning at least in the work of repairing the alleged desolating ravages of sixty years of free trade? Everything is in favour of the Government. They have a policy which they say they are agreed upon and which they understand themselves. The whole Party is said to be in absolute harmony, which must, of course, be quite true. They have a precedent in their own Sugar Convention, which not only retaliated by the imposition of countervailing duties but by the prohibition of the entrance to our ports of the commodity involved. They have a session with very little work to be done. And yet, according to the President of the Board of Trade and his colleagues, they are going to do nothing, but to wait for a mandate at the next general election. The only impatient person that I have discovered is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol. He, for one, evidently only half believes in this doctrine of retaliation, but with all the fevered and anxious zeal of the half-converted he wishes at once to rush into action. He is impatient of these dilatory pleas. Some Continental nations, he says, are engaged in framing tarifs de combat. There is the opportunity. Why not try your persuasive methods at once? Never mind the mandate, says the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know whether I am right in my suspicion, but it looks to me as if the right hon. Gentleman was anxious that if they are to flourish their weapon in the face of their rivals and neighbours it had better be done before the weapon is loaded, lest the kick of their pistol be more than they can stand. This policy of freedom of negotiation has been dealt with very gingerly as if it were some poisonous draught, and not what it is represented to be, the dearly purchased elixir of Party harmony and fiscal regeneration. Is it uncharitable to suggest that the official policy is, after all, not entirely believed in by any section of those who have adopted it, and that it has in fact been adopted, not to please either the free-traders or the protectionists, for both dislike it, and not in the interest of trade, but as a formula devised to keep in a Conservative Ministry? If this is not the case, why is it that free-traders opposite cannot whole-heartedly support it, and why do protectionists and preferentialists, which is the same thing, show no enthusiasm for it, and in fact pour contempt upon it as a final arrangement, and only tolerate it as a halfway house, or the sign board of a halfway house, on the high road to protection?

Our efforts have been directed, not with much success, to discover the nature of this policy, what it covers, how far it goes, and whether it includes more than it seems to include, whether it will stand on its own legs, whether it is a practical policy economically and constitutionally defensible. Speeches of members of the Government, Cabinet Ministers and others, have not, I am sorry to say, helped us much; but a most remarkable fact in the debate is this—that in this great financial discussion from first to last not a word has come to us from the Minister of Finance. Was ever such a thing seen before? It is almost farcical; it is a slight to the House and the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): If the right hon. Gentleman knew the facts I do not think he would make that statement. For private reasons it was not open to me to take part in the early days of the debate, and at the request of my right hon. friend who is leading the House I had arranged to speak on Friday. I did not do so because we received a message from the other side to the effect that, owing to the number of Members who wished to take part in the debate, no representative of the Front Bench opposite would speak on Friday, and, as I understood, they hoped no representative of this Bench would speak. In any case, it is not fair to say I was slighting the House because in the circumstances I had not taken part in the debate.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that I was not imputing any slight to him personally. I meant the Government, who arrange the debate. I would also point out to the right hon. Gentleman that if anyone had known he was desirous of speaking, any self-denying ordinance on Friday, such as he speaks of, would have been dropped at once, and that there have been other opportunities—today for instance. [HON. MEMBERS: Now!] I adhere to what I said—I will venture to say there is no instance of a fiscal, financial discussion of such vital importance having been carried on in the House and the Minister of Finance not taking his part in it. The right hon. Gentleman, to whom, I assure him, we all mean well and wish well, really must be aware of the fact that he is himself in a somewhat delicate position. It is not as if he was a Finance Minister who had been established in his office, and whose benign, serene tranquillity had been suddenly broken into by this troublesome question of tariff reform; not at all—the volcano was in full operation before the right hon. Gentleman was appointed. He was appointed when the policy of the Government was determined upon in order to carry out that policy. If I may adopt a barbarous expression it has been the custom to introduce in other debates, he was an ad hoc Minister, and therefore there was a peculiar obligation upon him to take part in the discussion. I am not going to analyse the speeches of other Ministers who have spoken; their vagueness, inconsistency, and variety will be remembered without quotation. They have obviously been angling day after day for the support of their followers. If a gaudy fly did not provoke a rise from a particular trout whom they wished to catch, although it was acceptable to others whom they could catch any day, then the next Minister would put on a fly of a more sober colour, and so on. These performances went on under our eyes. "We are prepared to fight for free trade," said the President of the Board of Trade. No other Minister said that, and it was pretty clear that no other Minister even thought it; and even the President of the Board of Trade, while saying that the policy of the Government was not protection, yet used all the protectionist arguments, and declared his own personal adhesion to the policy of preference and taxed food. Every other Minister who spoke in this Ministry which is "prepared to fight for free trade," either in open words or by implication, sympathised with the Birmingham policy. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, speaking at Leamington on 26th January, said—

> "The result of the deliberations which he had imperfectly placed before them was that there must be a revision of our fiscal system, which must recover the power of negotiation, and, having brought about such a revision, we shall sooner or later come to colonial preference."

This is the Government which is, two or three years hence, to go to the country at a general election to get a mandate on the sole question of liberty of negotiation, and who will give no support, as I understand it, to those further policies which the right hon. Gentleman has pointed to as having his sympathy. Then, here is the Home Secretary, who, speaking at Swansea on 27th January, said—

> "The Government did not intend to tax raw material, and have no desire to tax food in such a way as to increase in the aggregate the cost of living to the working man. If without increasing the cost of living to the working man we could construct a satisfactory tariff by shifting the burden from one class of food to another, he did not see why it should not be done."

The language when we hear it seems strangely familiar. Why? Because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham put forward this idea at Glasgow, almost in these very terms, and the words seem to cover that further policy with which the Government now say they will have nothing to do. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded—

> "The Conservative and Unionist Party were unanimous as to the first part of the programme. The second part of the programme desired by Mr. Chamberlain was difficult of realisation at once, but he felt convinced himself that the country would give in the first instance the mandate which was asked for."

The mandate is to be given as the first step towards the further policy; if the further policy is not intended, the words were calculated to mislead those who heard them. Again, I quote the right hon. Gentleman on an earlier occasion at Canterbury, when he exhibited an extraordinary intimacy with the mind of the Prime Minister, which really disposes of the whole question of the possibility of any one representing the Prime Minister in this House, because he said this—

> "The Prime Minister had laid down a policy which fell a little short, possibly, of the policy which some of his friends and himself would like to see adopted. The majority"—

That is of the Party—

> "supported the Prime Minister, who on every other subject but the taxation of food"— that is to say, a tax on manufactures and preference—

> "was absolutely in accord with the late Colonial Secretary."

Those are all the quotations with which I shall trouble the House, except one, and it is from a speech delivered at Dover by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, where he said:—

> "Mr. Chamberlain had laid down a high commission"—

Not the Tariff Commission—

> "in order that he might more freely reconnoitre the route whence he thought the best and surest way towards the closer unity of the Empire. Mr. Chamberlain said he did not wish to commit the main body of the Unionist army to that route until he had explored it."

The House will see that here we have the same thing. We have the declaration made in this House that the Government are not prepared to go one inch beyond negotiation or retaliation, but in reality their eye all the time is upon further progress upon the line of route towards protection. So that, even if the Home Secretary were to come forward with the tongue of an angel or with some pontifical rescript and preach free trade, he could not obliterate the words of his colleagues or exorcise the tone of pure protection which has been sounded in the declarations of the Government in this critical debate, and which has pervaded their electoral action in the country. That is the impression left by the debate upon the House and the country. It was inevitable. Why? Because retaliation on the lines and in the interest of free trade—the sort of retaliation which has been indicated—is both economically and constitutionally impossible in this country. Take the economic view first. A tariff country may take up with reciprocity as a means of advance towards free trade, because it has duties on hand which it can modify or abandon to suit its purpose, and conceivably in such a case something may be done against hostile tariffs. But a free-trade country cannot remain free-trade if it declares war on tariffs and tries to check dumping by duties and prohibitions. It was said by the President of the Local Government Board that when other countries knew that the Government was authorised to use retaliatory powers, the effect would be almost as great as if those powers were actually exercised. But if I may use a word which I dislike—though not so much as I dislike the thing it stands for—that would be bluffing. And how kind and considerate the right hon. Gentleman has been to all rivals in informing them of the nature of his game. Tariff attacks, said the Prime Minister at Sheffield, must be met by tariff replies. If once these tariffs are applied, human nature being what it is, they will remain in force and become the centre of attraction for fresh protection. It was by this line of reasoning that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham arrived at Glasgow at his 10 per cent. on manufactured goods. He foresaw the future of this weapon of negotiation; and knowing that tariffs once applied would stick, and be followed by other tariffs, he cut the knot boldly and declared for a general tariff on manufactures.

The case could not be put more clearly than by the hon. Member for the Partick division. He speaks with no small authority, for if he stands not upon the throne he is near it, and he says—

> "Once accept the principle of using tariffs for other purposes than revenue only, and a great many other things must follow. The country would be asked for a full and deliberate mandate to use the tariff for political purposes, to obtain employment, and a higher class of employment for the people, to draw the parts of the Empire closer together. This undoubtedly means preference, a duty on manufactures, a general tariff, and a tax on food."

It is no good saying "That is not the kind of retaliation we have in our minds." These things are governed by laws, not by declarations, and if in a free-trade country you begin using tariffs for purposes other than revenue, where can you stop? The acceptance of protection becomes a question only of time and degree. Thus retaliation is fatal to free trade. But it is also fatal to constitutional rule and procedure. Why? You have only to bear in mind the root distinction between a free-trade country and a tariff country, as parties to commercial negotiations, to see it at once, and to understand why the Government will not tell us, in spite of all our questions, what share Parliament is to have in the imposition and the removal of the contemplated tariffs. The distinction is this. A tariff country has only to adjust duties already sanctioned by the Legislature. I ask the attention of the House to this argument. In a tariff country they deal with a tariff already sanctioned by the Legislature, whereas in our case the negotiator, be he Chancellor of the Exchequer, Secretary of State, or President of a Department, must of necessity impose duties, whether it be done by Order in Council or otherwise, and the essence of the transaction is that you will have tariffs imposed by Executive action. This House cannot negotiate a treaty of commerce. The part of Parliament would therefore be limited to giving a general assent to the Executive to put on what duties it pleased. That is what it comes to, and there is no other way of it. This is a power which neither this House nor the country, please heaven, will ever grant. The Chief Secretary to-day used a phrase that I think was well calculated to startle us. He said there was to be no departure in their policy from the doctrine of free trade, the only departure would be from the "routine of Budget-making." In other words, it would mean the abolition of the immemorial control of this House over the taxation and the finance of the nation. What is Budget-making? It is the imposition or the removal of taxation—

MR. WYNDHAM: I am very sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but if he quotes one phrase from my speech he must quote another—subject to the effective control of Parliament, or, rather, of this House, over the financial policy of the country.

*SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A perfectly meaningless qualification ["Oh"] because there would be required a general power given by Act of Parliament to the Executive, the consent of the House of Lords would then be necessary to alter that, and the House would deliberately have parted with its freedom of action in this most vital matter. I conceive that this constitutional effect of this proposal far exceeds in importance the fiscal effect. The right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, if they wish now to negotiate for better terms with any country, can negotiate as much as they like, imposing the condition, as was done with your Sugar Convention, that the assent of Parliament must be obtained. What the right hon. Gentleman points to is a totally different matter; it is the granting to the Executive of a standing power to do as they like in the matter of taxation. ["No."] Yes, and that is such an infringement of the rights of Parliament and the proper constitutional methods followed in this country that I think it deserves to be pointed out in order that the House and the country may see in what direction they are being led. Did the Government not know they would be cutting into the fibres of the Constitution by such a principle? If so, what are we to think? If they did know it, and yet went on, still more what are we to think?

I have addressed my observations almost entirely to this question of retaliation, because that is the question before the House. It is the Government policy which we have been desiring to get at, to obtain information about.

MR. WYNDHAM: Hear, hear!

*SIR H. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: I cannot say that either from the right hon. Gentleman who cheers or from any other have we received more than ambiguous and general phrases; but still we know enough from the speeches that have been made, and the indications therein, the tendency and the mind of the Government and of its members, to be sure that the acceptance of that policy would lead straight, and without long delay, to the doctrines and practice of the Birmingham school; in other words, to full-fledged and unblushing protection. On that ground we are opposed, on this side of the House, root and branch to the whole policy. There must be many on the other side of the House who share that view. We have seen with admiration and respect the courageous action of members of the Party opposite who have sacrificed old associations, old claims upon their affection, and sacrificed to some extent, I dare say, the friendship of their friends in order to adhere to what they believe to be fiscal rectitude and sound policy. They have followed, no doubt at a great interval, the noble example set by the greatest leader their Party ever had, Sir Robert Peel, who made similar sacrifices in his time. I, of course, have no right, no claim, or wish to speak for those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen. As for those with whom I have the honour of acting, I can only repeat that we adhere to the old doctrines on this subject, and that we shall give to any departure from them, whether it be a large departure or a small departure leading to the larger one, the strongest opposition.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): Mr. Speaker, I cannot but express my regret, although I think it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Fife who said we had had enough expressions of regret, at the absence of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. I regret it not only on account of his illness, which is a regret common to both sides of the House, but because it places me in the somewhat difficult position of having to wind up this debate. I trust that in these circumstances I can count on the kind indulgence of the House. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has addressed a few words of congratulation and support to certain hon. friends of mine who at the present moment are sitting below the gangway. He has suggested that through the action they have taken there may be some loss of friendship. May I assure them that, so far as I am concerned, I shall never forget the years we have served together, and that, on whichever side of the House we may sit, I hope there will be a continuance of the same friendly relations which have existed for so many years past? The right hon. Gentleman, and, in fact, nearly every speaker who has taken part in this debate, has hurled against the Government the charge that we are in favour of protection. We are not in favour of protection. We have not advocated it, and we do not intend to advocate it.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich): It is being advocated in South Birmingham.

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I will not give way to the noble Lord. The noble

Lord has interrupted regularly throughout this debate.

Lord HUGH CECIL made an interruption which was not heard in the gallery.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: The noble Lord says that protection has been advocated in Birmingham.

Lord HUGH CECIL: Yes, in South Birmingham, by the Government candidate.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I will deal with that subject, if the noble Lord will allow me, a little later on in my speech. I am very anxious to say something about Government candidates and Government supporters if he will kindly bear with me for a few moments; and I hope he will not be disappointed. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has asked us whether we are going to fight the battle of free trade. We are going to fight the battle of freer trade. We are anxious to see a reduction in those hostile tariffs which have been so inimical to the trade and commerce of this country. We have been denounced because, in the absence of the Prime Minister, there was no one who could state the policy of the Government, and it has been said that in his absence the House was entirely gnorant of what that policy was. I venture to think that those who listened to the speech of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade on Monday last, cannot but think that he worthily filled the position which would have been taken by his right hon. relative if he had been well enough to be in the House and to discharge the duty of explaining our policy. He announced the policy which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister put before the country at Sheffield. That is the policy of the Government, and that is the policy of every member on this Bench. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has another complaint. He has told us that the Government intended to pursue this policy and to bring about an alteration of our fiscal system by Executive action and without taking the House of Commons into consultation. It is not a part of the Government's policy to withdraw in any way from this House any control which it has over the fiscal or financial arrangements of the country. I should like to state again, to my hon. friends especially, what is the policy, as I define it, laid down by the Prime Minister. I will state it in the fewest and clearest words that I can use. The principles of the policy are—that the Government, when conducting negotiations with foreign countries, should have the power, when necessary, to threaten retaliation, and when the threat is insufficient that they should have power to carry it out. The Government have no intention of taxing raw material, and their policy does not include the taxation of food. Neither do the Government propose the imposition of any taxation for the purpose of fostering a home industry which is subjected only to natural and legitimate competition. I think there was some misunderstanding with regard to a remark made by my right hon. friend the Secretary for the Colonies, which has led some of my hon. friends to think that, when a retaliatory duty is put on, the Government's intention is to keep it on for all time. Of course, if a retaliatory duty has been put on to secure a particular object, and that result has been achieved by means of it, naturally the duty would come off.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): And if the object is not secured ?

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: If it is not secured it would be kept on. Objection has been taken in the course of the debate with regard to the question of colonial preference. Well, the question of colonial preference does not come within the policy of His Majesty's Government, and that was made perfectly clear by the statement of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in his speech at Sheffield. That statement was confirmed by my right hon. friend in a further speech which he made at Bristol. He then said that no colonial preference which involved a tax upon food would be included in the policy which he put forward at Sheffield. My right hon. friend said at Sheffield—

"I am speaking here as one who is bound to give advice to a great Party on the policy that they should regard as their official policy, and, as the best result of my reflection, I am bound to ask them to consider that a tax upon food in the present state of public opinion is not within the limits of practical politics."

Some hon. Gentlemen seem to think that we are going to carry out this policy without consulting the people of this country. We have distinctly stated that this policy is not to come into operation during this Parliament, and that it is not to come into operation until there has been a distinct opinion given in its favour by the electorate of the country—that is, the policy of retaliation; I have already pointed out that preference is not a part of the Government policy at all.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Do the Government oppose it?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: Certainly the Government will be bound to oppose it in keeping their pledge, and until the electorate have pronounced in its favour. We should have to have the distinct opinion of the people of the country that that policy should be adopted.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): Have you no opinion of your own?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I have a very strong opinion myself that it should not come into operation until those conditions are fulfilled. With regard to the policy of retaliation, some of my hon. friends seem to think that it is a new policy which has recently been adopted by the Conservative Party. My recollection goes back to 1880, when the Prime Minister said in this House that he desired to see a policy of retaliation adopted. In 1882, my right hon. friend the Member for Croydon put forward a Resolution in favour of an inquiry into the fiscal system of the country, and in the speech which he made on that occasion, he distinctly advocated retaliation and said he saw no reason at all why retaliation was in any way a departure from free-trade doctrine. In 1885, Lord Salisbury advised the country that further weapons were necessary in order to deal with hostile tariffs which were in an unfriendly spirit imposed on the goods of this country. Speaking again in 1902, at Hastings, the noble Lord again advocated that policy. It is, therefore, no new policy; it is no new departure, and my right hon. friend will be making no new departure in Conservative policy in adopting a policy of retaliation. Then, Sir, the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich raised some question with regard to the treatment of Government Members and candidates. May I say a word or two as to the policy adopted by the Party to its candidates and to Members, and I think the noble Lord will do me this favour to admit that I am able to speak with some authority? I have been associated with Conservative organisations for as long a time, I think, as any Member of this House, probably with the exception of my hon. friends the Members for Dartford and Cambridge University, and I can say this, that we have never made economic questions a test of Party loyalty. It has been recognised that in the Conservative Party differences of opinion might exist on this particular question. It has been recognised in the course of the debate that men holding very different opinions on this question might be in the same Cabinet. In fact, I remember that my right hon. friend the Member for Thanet sat in the same Government with so strong a free-trader as Sir Stafford Northcote, and again there sat in the same Cabinet my right hon. friend the Member for Sleaford and my right hon. friend the Member for West Bristol. The question or the doctrine rather of Cabinet responsibility is in no wise altered by recent proceedings. The responsibility of the Cabinet affects the action of the Cabinet, but I have never heard it laid down that the Members composing the Cabinet were compelled to speak with one voice upon questions not included in the policy of the Cabinet or under their consideration, nor have I ever heard it said that it would be possible to take that course. You have the case of coalition Governments. How could they be formed if Members were precluded from holding different views. And so I go on with regard to the question of Party management now. It has been the invariable rule of the Conservative Party to give support to the central authority and to the candidate who is prepared to support the general policy of the Party as laid down by the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Party, and providing he has the support of the local associations. We have never forced a candidate on the local associations, and we have never refused support to their adopted candidate. The noble Lord wanted to know whether an hon. Member supporting the Sheffield policy and an hon. Member supporting a more advanced policy would receive the same support from the Conservative Association. I should say certainly, as long as they receive the support of their local associations; and my hon. friend the Secretary to the Treasury has observed that he would certainly make no difficulty with regard to the candidates who are standing now. The condition must be that they are supported by their local associations and that they necessarily support the policy of the Government. How else would hon. Members have it?

*Lord HUGH CECIL: If the Government really want to fight for free trade, that is not the way to do it.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I am perfectly prepared to argue this point, though a domestic incident of this sort is one which should be discussed at a Party meeting rather than in the House of Commons. I think I am right in saying that this is a subject which has been not only pressed upon us by hon. Members below the gangway but by an authority like the hon. Member for South Aberdeen.

May I now return to the Amendment? Apart from being a vote of censure, it would not be very difficult, if the Amendment were dissected, to find reasons for supporting it on this side of the House. The first part of this Amendment says—

> "But it is our duty, however, humbly to represent to Your Majesty that our effective deliberation on the financial service of the year is impaired by conflicting declarations from Your Majesty's Ministers."

I do not think the preamble of the Amendment has any real effect. I am quite sure that hon. Members can perfectly well discuss the Estimates for the present year, especially as the subject which we have been discussing for six days cannot possibly form a part of the subject of discussion. In other words, the fiscal policy is no portion of the year's Estimates, and Gentlemen interested in Supply will find no difficulty at all in exercising their powers of ample criticism. I am perfectly certain that the hon. Member for King's Lynn will be able to fully discuss the Estimates, and that the hon. Member for Mid Lanark will also be able to criticise them. The chief point now under consideration is contained in the following words of the Amendment—

> "We respectfully submit to Your Majesty the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has for more than half a century actively conduced to the vast extension of the trade and commerce of the realm and to the welfare of its population; and this House believes that, while the needs of social improvement are still manifold and urgent, any return to protective duties, more particularly when imposed on the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to our national strength, contentment, and well-being."

That is not a proposition which in the ordinary way any one on this side of the House would be inclined to dispute. But it is put down as a vote of censure, and therefore the Government are bound to resist it. The right hon. Gentleman has, with that galaxy of legal talent which surrounds him, drawn an Amendment with great success to entice the votes of certain Members on this side of the House. They must know what is the effect of a vote of censure, and I trust that they will not be led away on this occasion, but will support His Majesty's Government. I should like to tell them what would happen if this Resolution were carried. It would mean the breaking up of the Unionist Party on an imaginary issue. Do my hon. and right hon. friends wish to place on those Benches a Government which is supported, as we hear they would be, by the Nationalist vote.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND: That depends.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I judge so from the speech delivered to-night by the hon. Member the Leader of the Irish Party. That Government would comprise men who are pledged to the policy of Home Rule, and to all the endless items of the Newcastle programme? At a moment of grave international crisis, when questions of vast gravity have occurred in the Far East, when it is essential in the interests of the Empire that there should be a Government which has shown its desire for the maintenance of the Empire's prestige in order to deal with them promptly and effectively, I would ask my hon. friends below the gangway on this side of the House—Are they going to give their verdict on this question in the absence of Prime Minister? If their loyalty to him is sincere, I appeal to them with all the force at my command not to record a judgment against him in his absence.

SIR J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College): I crave leave to ask my right hon. friend one question upon a point which I did not understand clearly from his speech. I think he wished to make it clear. Is the Government opposed to the taxation of food as proposed by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham? I understand that that proposal is not part of the Government's policy, but I beg to ask whether the Government is or is not opposed to that proposal?

SIR LEES KNOWLES (Salford, West): Are the Government opposed to a duty on food or raw material?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I have said that the Government are opposed to any duty on raw material or food.

Question put.

Statement of the funds, 5th January, 1904. Delivered (pursuant to Act), and ordered to lie on the Table.

SEA FISHERIES BILL [H.L.].

[SECOND READING.]

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (The Earl of ONSLOW): My Lords, undersized flat fish have not been fortunate at the hands of Parliament. Many Bills have been brought in to endeavour to preserve them, but none of them have succeeded in commanding the support of both Houses of Parliament. As long ago as 1888 this question was brought before Parliament by a conference of those interested in the trawling industry. Some of them waited upon me as a deputation a short time ago, and one or two of those gentlemen pathetically observed that most of those who had originally taken part in urging this question had now joined the great majority. A Bill was brought in by Mr. Bryce, then President of the Board of Trade, in 1895. Another Bill was brought in by the present Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Dudley), then representing the Board of Trade in this House, both in 1896 and 1897. In 1898 my noble friend Lord Heneage brought in a Bill, and in 1899 a measure was introduced by Lord Camperdown, and the last Bill on the subject was one brought in by Mr. Ritchie when he was President of the Board of Trade in 1900. That Bill was referred to a Commitee, which considered it very carefully. The Committee reported that in their opinion it had been established that there were certain well-known areas in the North Sea where small and young fish congregate, and that if we could prevent fishing in such areas it would obviously be of great value. They further reported that the proposal in the Bill to prevent the sale of undersized flat fish would introduce certain harassing conditions upon those who carried on their business along the shore and in the smaller trawling vessels, and in those circumstances the Committee thought it would not be expedient for the Bill to pass without further investigation; but they added that they were confident that the question of the diminution of he fish supply was a very pressing one and that the situation was going from bad to worse. No effort, they thought, ought to be spared to provide especially for the regulation of the Nort Sea area and for the adequate equipment of the Government Department which had control of the subject. Since then the catch of fish has, it is true, not materially fallen off, but the area to which the vessels go—from Iceland in the North to Portugal in the South—has increased enormously, as also has the number of vessels engaged in the trade. Therefore I do not think that the former statistics are at all comparable with the statistics obtainable to-day.

If your Lordships are pleased to give this Bill a Second Reading I propose to ask you to send it to a Select Committee of this House, before whom I believe I shall be able to lay an amount of evidence which was not before the Committee of 1900, and which, if it had been before that Committee, would, I think, very materially have influenced their decision. This question is not one which is being brought forward by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries on its own mere notion. It has been pressed upon it on all sides by those who are interested in the fishing industry. It has been pressed upon it by the owners of those large fleets that go to the North Sea to pursue their business, and it has been pressed equally by the various fisheries committees throughout the Kingdom. A very large sum of public money is being expended in investigation and research. This country joined an International Conference which was to inquire, among other things, into the reason why the supply of flat fish in the North Sea was being gradually depleted. A sum of £42,000 has been voted to be expended in three years. The investigations are to last for a longer period than that, but for at least three years this country is committed to an expenditure of £42,000 in the aggregate for the purpose of those investigations. After that it will be necessary to reconsider our position. When that £42,000 was authorised there was no Department specially concerned with the administration of the fisheries. Certain statutory duties concerning the interests of the fishing population of England and Wales were entrusted to the Board of Trade. It was therefore thought advisable to hand this sum of money over to two existing bodies, to the Scottish Fisheries Board and to the Marine Biological Association. The latter is a scientific institution, whose headquarters are at Plymouth, which is primarily, in fact I think I may say entirely, a biological association managed and administered by biologists; they have directed the investigations under their control more particularly to the direction and the temperature of the currents in the North Sea plankton, and also to that curious floating organism which is the fish food found in all parts of the ocean; but they have not directed their attention, at any rate to any great extent, in the direction of ascertaining what are the sizes of the fish caught, the localities in which they are caught, where they pass the different periods of their lives, and where they can be caught with least detriment to this industry. These things have been rather, I think, put aside, and indeed our Minister at Copenhagen has represented to His Majesty's Government that, while England has by far the largest take of fish, she is the most backward in giving information on the subjects to which I have just directed your Lordships' attention. When the time comes for a reconsideration of the relationship of this country to the other countries taking part in the conference, at the end of the first three years, I think it will be necessary very carefully to consider whether those two bodies to whom the expenditure of Great Britain's very large pecuniary contribution is entrusted are those most competent to expend it wisely and well. In addition to this sum £1,600 a year is expended by the Department over which I have the honour to preside in ascertaining the total catch and the total value of the fisheries of this country, and a further £1,000 a year is given for scientific purposes to the Marine Biological Association. I am happy to say that, owing to the generosity of one of the great City Livery Companies—the Fishmongers' Company—we have had the advantage of having placed at our disposal facilities which have enabled us to prosecute inquiries a little further. Under those arrangements we have been able to ascertain the fish brought into the market at Billingsgate and to divide them into three classes—namely, "large," "medium," and "small," and carefully to analyse them. From these returns we find that, during the months of March to July inclusive, the fleets fishing in the area off the Danish coast, in the nighbourhood of Heligoland, took very large quantities of small plaice. In 1902 the proportion of these fish to the total take was 82·6 per cent. by weight and 71·8 per cent. by value; in 1903 it was 69·2 per cent. by weight and 56·2 per cent by value. The term "small plaice" is however, merely a market distinction and includes fish from six inches to fifteen inches in length.

The investigations which I have referred to were conducted so as to ascertain the average proportion of fish of each size in a box of small plaice obtained from these grounds. A sufficient number of boxes to constitute a fair sample of the whole were bought on the market, and their contents, consisting of over 40,000, were measured. Similarly a sufficient number of each length were weighed so as to establish the average relation between length and weight. The average contents of a box was thus established, and by applying such knowledge to the statistical returns it was found that the fleets fishing on the Eastern grounds referred to had in 1902 an average catch of over 40 per cent., and in 1903 over 36 per cent. by weight of plaice under ten inches, and, in 1902, of over 60 per cent., and in 1903, of 53 per cent. by weight of plaice under eleven inches. I think that conclusively proves that the vessels which go out to fish in this great nursery ground in the North Sea bring home a very large number of fish which, if they were allowed to grow to mature size, would enormously increase the amount of the food supply.

This Bill is of a somewhat elastic character, and I have so drafted it bcause the Icthyological Committee which sat in 1903 recommended that, in view of the difficulty of carrying out reliable investigations as to the effect of natural causes on the supply of fish, the effect of such operations on the fisheries could best be tested by regulating such operations experimentally, and it is experimentally that we desire to proceed in this Bill. I am sorry that my noble friend Lord Tweedmouth is not in his place, because he has taken a great interest, from the beginning, in all these fisheries questions. I have read carefully the objections which he advanced against the Bills that have been introduced in former years. One suggestion which he made was that this ought to be dealt with rather by international agreement than by legislation in this country. There is nothing in this Bill which will prevent our entering into any international agreement, but that is a matter involving considerable time and a great deal of waiting, and we cannot afford to wait in this matter. I think your Lordships will see that it is highly desirable that this country at any rate should proceed as rapidly as possible to do something to prevent the destruction of undersized fish in the great nursery grounds of the North Sea.

The Board of Agriculture, to which has been referred the duties of watching over the fisheries, has for many years been entrusted by Parliament with discretionary powers by way of Order. That was originally done in the case of diseases of animals, and the object of the Board, which has been completely attained, has been, not to force public opinion, but to endeavour, as far as possible, to follow and to live up to it. We have begun with Orders which, perhaps, have been by many people thought not sufficiently stringent. We have increased from time to time their stringency, and in the case of diseases of animals we are at present most loyally supported by those who are interested in agriculture, in our desire to stamp out the diseases which we have not already obliterated. It is in the same way that we hope to proceed by this Bill. If you look at Clause 1 you will observe that the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries are to be empowered to make Orders for the purpose of preventing the destruction of undersized flat fish, either absolutely or subject to such exemptions or conditions as may be prescribed.

The matters which we shall have to consider, and which the Committee will have to consider, are, first, what months in the year shall that prescription apply to; secondly, what is the class of vessels which shall be prohibited from landing undersized fish; and, thirdly, what shall be the size of fish the landing of which shall be prohibited. Under the former Bills it was an offence to sell any fish under a certain size, that size being prescribed in the Bill, and it was stated, with, I daresay, a great deal of truth, that as that applied indiscriminately to everybody engaged in fishing, it might work great hardship to the small people along the shore, who, although they may destroy a certain number of undersized fish, do nothing like the damage done by trawlers in the North Sea. The object of this Bill is to exempt many small boats catching undersized fish to an extent which is infinitesimal compared to the resources of the sea, but which may be of vital importance to the immediate owner in obtaining his livelihood. Such vessels may be found at Ramsgate, Brixham, and, indeed, all round the coast, and I do not propose to interfere with people getting such a livelihood. It is true that it is impossible to avoid catching these small fish if you go to the ground where they are, but we believe, from the evidence before us, that it will not be worth the while of the trawlers to go to these nurseries of small fish if you prevent them from landing them after they have been caught. They will go to other parts of the North Sea, and these nurseries will be preserved as breeding grounds for the fish.

Perhaps I may explain how it comes that this particular area is the breeding ground of the North Sea. The current is always running from West to East, the spawn of the fish floats in the water and is carried by the current into that angle between the North of Germany and Jutland; it cannot get any further and strikes up against the coast; the young fish are hatched out and travel back to the large banks adjoining Heligoland. If they are allowed to remain there a year undisturbed they become good sized fish, and swim out into the larger area of the North Sea. There is a clause in the Bill which gives power to the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries to prevent trawling within a three mile limit of the shore; that power is already in the hands of the fisheries committees all round the coast. There are, I think, 1,700 miles of coast line, and there are some parts where the prohibitions might with advantage be extended. All we ask is that Parliament should give to us the same powers as are now possessed by fisheries committees all round the coast. It is high time that England should set an example to other countries. Other countries have passed limits for fish, but we have no undersized limit in this country. I am informed that there is no sale for undersized fish on the Continent, and certainly the first vessels we should prohibit landing fish on these shores would be foreign vessels bringing them in when English vessels are prevented from doing so.

We should first confine the prohibition to those steam carriers and large trawlers that go out to the North Sea. We are invited to do so by the great companies who own these trawlers and carriers, and I believe there is no difference of opinion amongst those who represent the great fishing interest upon this subject. The diminution of the fish food supply of this country is a very serious matter. It is one which at a very early date will inevitably come home to the population, particularly the poorer population, and unless something is done, at a very early date, my fear is that there will be a very serious diminution in the food supply of this country. This Bill is designed, as I have said, with a certain amount of elasticity, to enable us to proceed tentatively, so that if we make a false step we are able to retreat. I think the way in which the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries has been supported by the farming interest in this country is such that I may safely ask your Lordships to give it a certain discretion in this matter. The Bills that have been introduced before have not been very successful, but I earnestly hope, and confidently expect, that a measure of this kind, which will not interfere with the small shrimper and the longshoreman round the coast, while it will impose a self-denying ordinance on the owners of large steam trawlers and carriers, will meet with but little opposition. I therefore invite your Lordships to give it a Second Reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.—(The Earl of Onslow.)

LORD HENEAGE: My Lords, I wish to congratulate my noble friend on having put his shoulder to the wheel and brought forward this measure. Although it is a somewhat different measure from that brought forward in previous years, I, for my part, speaking as the President of the Sea Fisheries' Protection Association, prefer the lines on which it is drawn, because it is an enabling Bill; it is not a hard and fast measure. It will enable my noble friend who has the interest of sea fisheries and other fisheries to look after, to alter at various times his Orders by the light of experience, and that, I think, will be a very great gain, without having to go to Parliament. I do not propose to enter at all into those parts of my noble friend's speech in which he alluded to certain controversial subjects. These will be thoroughly threshed out in the Select Committee which he proposes to ask your Lordships to appoint. I should like to say that we who represent the sea fisheries industry do not look upon the Report of the Select Committee of 1900 with very much respect. We think it was rather a perfunctory examination of the question, and that the object of the Select Committee was rather more to cover the retreat of Mr. Ritchie in withdrawing his Bill than to get at any amount of satisfactory evidence. We prefer to go back to the Committee of 1893, presided over by my noble friend Lord Tweedmouth, which thoroughly threshed out this question and took evidence on all sides. The opposition to the Bill was very well managed, but, notwithstanding that, this very large Committee, representing England, Scotland, and Ireland, were unanimously of opinion that it was time something was done to stop the destruction of undersized fish; they were also unanimously of opinion that, considering all the proposals made to them, there was only one possible way of doing it, and that was to prevent the sale of undersized fish. It was on the Report of that Committee that all these Bills were brought in, first by Mr. Bryce, then by Mr. Ritchie, and afterwards by myself. They were all framed on the Report of this Committee which had thoroughly threshed out the question. We do not, as I say, pay very much attention to the Report of the Committee of 1900, as we think that the recommendation that more scientific evidence was required was against the weight of evidence. The Committee stated distinctly that one of the causes of this diminution of the fish supply was undoubedly the destruction of immature fish. Again they said—

> "Your Committee find that the subject of the diminution of the fish supply is a very pressing one, and the situation is going from bad to worse."

But, notwithstanding those statements, they decided that the measure should be postponed for want of more scientific evidence. We do not think that scientific evidence is of so very much importance. We think this a practical question, on which practical men who go out to the North Sea have a far better knowledge than these scientific professors.

This question has now been before the country for nearly twenty years. In 1888 and 1889 it was the subject of discussion before the Sea Fisheries' Association, when 200 delegates were present from England, Scotland, and Ireland; and in the following year there was also a large conference in which representatives were present from Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Spain, and they were absolutely unanimous with regard to the solution of the question, which was that the only possible chance was to stop the sale of undersized fish. My noble friend said just now that he thought a country like this ought to lead in promoting such legislation. Well, Mr. Ritchie, speaking seven years ago, made a very strong speech in favour of it, and he then said—

> "It is one of those questions on which other countries have moved, and on which we ought not to be behindhand."

That was seven years ago; therefore what we have to do now is to make up for lost time. I hope the Bill will not only be given a Second Reading, but that it will successfully pass through the Select Committee and the other House of Parliament. I have much pleasure, as President of the Sea Fisheries' Protection Association, in giving the Bill my support.

On Question, Bill read 2^a, and referred to a Select Committee.

RAILWAY RATES ON MILK AND AGRICULTURAL PRODUCE.

*THE EARL OF LICHFIELD : My Lords, I rise to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether any arrangements have been made by the Board with the railway companies with regard to the conditions affecting the carriage of milk and other agricultural produce. With regard to the latter part of my question—that which refers to other agricultural produce—I do not intend to trouble your Lordships at any length. It is a very complicated and difficult matter, and is chiefly, I imagine, a question of rates ; but, at the same time, it is one of vital importance to the whole agricultural interest in the United Kingdom, and I cannot help hoping that the negotiations which I believe have been going on between the Board of Agriculture and the railway companies may be successful from our point of view, and that the President of the Board of Agriculture will be able to announce that he has made satisfactory arrangements with those companies. But on the question affecting the carriage of milk, I should like to trouble your Lordships with a few words, because the conditions are so extremely unsatisfactory to the agricultural community, Your Lordships may be aware that the only way in which milk can be carried on the railways is either at the parcels rate, which is practically a prohibitive rate, or at the owner's risk rate. As a matter of fact, nearly the whole of the milk trade is carried on at the owner's risk rate, and the unfortunate farmer is allowed no compensation for loss or damage to his milk. The railway companies only undertake to compensate when it has been proved that their servants have been wilfully neglectful.

Those conditions are extremely unsatisfactory for the farmers, and I should like to read to your Lordships one or two typical cases. Here is the first. Milk duly consigned, carriage paid, takes eleven days to reach its destination — a distance of about 100 miles. The railway company, although repeatedly pressed, absolutely decline to make any compensation. Here is another case. Milk duly consigned, carriage paid, is spilt on the railway. The company admit this, but refuse to entertain a claim for compensation. The third case that I will quote is that of milk duly consigned, carriage paid, but never heard of again. The railway company said that they could find no trace whatever of the milk in question, and declined to give any compensation. I can assure your Lordships that those cases are typical of many hundreds throughout the kingdom, and what we hope the Board of Agriculture will be able to arrange is that the railway companies should admit responsibility and pay the farmer in cases of loss or damage.

I should like also to call attention to the exceedingly insanitary state of the milk vans in hot weather. I have heard of cases in which fish has been sent in the same van as milk, and also a live boar. Milk has also been sent in the same van as offal from slaughter-houses, the stink from which was said to be abominable.

The result is that in the hot weather the milk so sent is very liable to arrive at its destination sour and tainted, and is refused on that account by the consignee. What we desire is that there should be some special regulations under which milk should be carried in vans by itself, and that the vans should be properly cleaned and washed out. In many cases they are not swilled out half frequently enough. An individual farmer by himself is practically powerless to get any redress from the railway companies, and, as a consequence, many societies have, of late years, been started throughout the country to help the farmers in these and other matters, and representations have been made to the Board of Agriculture through these societies, giving cases of complaint, and urging the Board to take up this question on behalf of the farmers and endeavour to make more satisfactory arrangements with the railway companies.

I cannot help thinking that the railway companies will accede to a request put before them by such a powerful institution as the Board of Agriculture. Our railways are managed by able and sensible men, and I feel convinced that they will find it to their own interests to accede to those demands. The present conditions do not favour an increase in the milk trade, for farmers get discouraged. I am confident that if there were better regulations and more chance of farmers getting compensation when they suffer loss on the railway, the trade would be increased, and in the end the railway companies would benefit. There is one thing certain, that under present conditions the servants of railway companies know that their masters will not have to pay if they are careless, and the result is that they are extremely careless. If the railway companies undertook to pay for damage, they would very soon make their servants much more particular and careful in handling the milk, and, therefore, I do not think that in the end the companies would have to pay very much by way of compensation.

There is only one point further that I should like to submit to the President of the Board of Agriculture, and it is this. Is the noble Earl correctly reported as having said the other day that his Board intended at an early date to introduce a measure dealing with adulterated butter? I hope that may be so. We were all very much disappointed that no mention was made of the subject in His Majesty's most gracious Speech. It was alluded to last year, and a Bill dealing with the subject passed through several stages in the House of Commons; but, I suppose, mainly owing to the lamented death of Mr. Hanbury, and the dislocation that ensued at the Board of Agriculture, the Bill did not pass. I can assure the noble Earl that this is a very important matter, and one in respect of which we look to him for help. I hope that not only will a Bill be introduced, but that every effort will be made by the Government to get it passed into law this session.

LORD MONTEAGLE OF BRANDON: My Lords, this is a matter of vital concern to Ireland, as well as to England. The Irish farmers' grievance is even greater than that of the English farmer, and I have no doubt that if anything is done the benefits of that measure will be extended to Ireland. I should like to point out one or two special points where this matter touches us in Ireland. The question roughly divides itself into one of rates and one of facilities. The question of rates is not so much for the Board of Agriculture as for the Board of Trade; but with regard to the question of facilities, the difficulties of the position are very much aggravated for the Irish farmer by the breaking of bulk in crossing the channel. It is practically impossible for the Irish farmer to get any redress. In these cases where a grievance exists of goods being injured in transit by what must be gross negligence, there is a difficulty of bringing it home to any of the different companies concerned, because there are more than one of them. I believe that the law is that the receiving company alone is responsible, and once they have handed over the consignment to a steamship company their responsibility ceases. The person sending the goods has to proceed against the company that receives them from him, and he cannot get any redress, for all that the company has to do is to prove that it passed the goods on to another company. That is one of our grievances. As regards other agricultural produce, I believe there are also great difficulties in the matter of proper sanitary precautions and so forth for the cross channel traffic, both as regards milk, butter, and other perishable traffic, and the cattle trade. But perhaps this is also rather within the purview of the Board of Trade, and therefore I will not detain the House upon it. I only rose for the purpose of emphasising the importance of this matter to Ireland, and of making an appeal to His Majesty's Government that any benefits extended to English farmers should be extended also to Irish farmers.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW: My Lords, perhaps I may be allowed to reply first to the Question which the noble Earl has put to me, but of which he did not give me notice—the question as to the introduction of a Bill for the regulation of the sale of butter. The Speech of His Gracious Majesty was, I think, of an unusual length, and perhaps butter was one of those subjects which might with best advantage be left out in the competition for mention in the King's Speech. As it had been generally announced in the country that the Government intended to reintroduce the Bill, I do not think any disappointment can have occurred in the minds of agriculturists. As a matter of fact, Mr. Fellowes, who represents the Board of Agriculture in the other House, has already given a promise to that effect, and he will introduce the Bill probably on Monday or Tuesday next, and it will then be printed and circulated. The noble Lord who has just sat down appealed that whatever was meted out to England should be meted out equally to Ireland. I am afraid I must say that in my opinion the Irish farmer is in a much better position, so far as regards funds, than the English farmer. We in England are always trying to get a little money out of the Treasury, whereas the Irish farmer has a very large sum of money at the disposal of the Agricultural Department in Ireland; and, more than that, he has one of the ablest representatives to deal with the matter in Mr. Horace Plunkett, and I am sure that in his hands the interests of Irish farmers have no chance of being neglected.

So far as the general question is concerned, I have been in correspondence with all the railway companies in England for some time past on the subject of facilities for agricultural traffic, and I shall hope, in the course of a few days, to lay upon the Table of both Houses of Parliament the correspondence which has taken place between us. Naturally, attention has been given to that very important trade, the milk trade. As the noble Lord has informed your Lordships, there are two rates—the owner's risk rate and the company's risk rate—and there is a material difference in the amount of the two. Not unnaturally the farmer prefers the lower rate, and the companies, when asked to compensate for loss, reply that if the owner chooses to send the goods at his own risk he must take the loss. However, I am glad to say that in this matter, at any rate, the companies have been disposed to meet the agriculturists as fairly as could reasonably be expected. They tell me that whilst they must maintain their legal position in regard to traffic conveyed at owner's risk, it is their practice, in a friendly way, to consider on its merits every case of total loss, wilful pilfering, or misdelivery. I should have thought that the can of milk that went astray for eleven days did so owing to misdelivery, and I am surprised that the company refused to entertain the application for compensation. But it must be remembered that this is ex gratia and not a legal position that can be enforced.

There is, I am afraid, a disposition to think that the Board of Agriculture can do a great deal more than they can. The only effective weapon is in the hands of every individual Member of Parliament, that is, to invite Parliament to refuse to consider any Bill which a particular company may put on the Table of the House unless they do so and so. That would be a strong step, and one which would not be supported in the country unless it was shown that the company treated those who sent produce by that railway in a manner which was manifestly inequitable and unfair. I have been lately considering whether it would not be to the greater advantage of farmers to send their goods at owner's risk, but to insure them. I believe that the difference between owner's risk, plus insurance, would be considerably less than if transmitted at company's risk, and I think that is worthy of their consideration. Farmers are, of course, entitled to ask that such a very delicate product as milk shall not be mixed up with anything which might easily taint it, such as fish. I can assure your Lordships that the Board of Agriculture have not lost sight of this very important question, but are in negotiation with the companies; and I hope to be able to show you exactly what the nature of those negotiations has been in the course of a very few weeks.

THE CASE OF CAPTAIN HARRISON.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I beg to ask His Majesty's Government what has been the result of the further communication which has been addressed by the Board of Trade to the Canadian Government relative to the case of Captain Harrison, of the ss. "Grecian," who successfully appealed in this country against the suspension of his certificate in Canada, but was required to pay the costs of his appeal; and whether there is now any probability of Captain Harrison being recouped the costs referred to.

LORD WOLVERTON: My Lords, in answer to the Question of my hon. friend I have to state that the circumstances of the case of the "Grecian," to which the noble Lord refers, were put by the Colonial Office to the Canadian Government. After careful consideration, the decision of the Canadian Government is that, as the master neglected to avail himself of his right of appeal to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in Canada, it is not considered that any obligation rests upon that Government to repay his expenses.

THE STRANDING OF THE "ISLE OF LEWIS" AND THE "DRUMBAIN."

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I beg to ask His Majesty's Government what were the circumstances attending the stranding of the steamer "Isle of Lewis," which drove ashore near Plymouth in October last; whether she was in ballast, and became unmanageable; and whether any formal investigation into the cause of the serious damage to this steamer has been held. Also, whether, in regard to the court of inquiry which investigated the circumstances attending the stranding of the steamer "Drumbain" in October last, any opinion was expressed by the court as to this disaster being caused by this vessel being light and in improper trim.

LORD WOLVERTON: My Lords, the noble Lord has raised two cases—the case of the "Isle of Lewis" and that of the "Drumbain." In the case of the "Isle of Lewis," the vessel took shelter in Plymouth in what may be described as a "whole gale" and was brought to an anchor. The master, however, found that the berth was likely to be a foul one owing to the proximity of another large steamer, and he hove up his anchors and navigated the vessel to what he considered a safer berth. In letting go the anchors a second time, a terrific squall struck the vessel and turned her broadside on to wind and sea, with the result that she dragged her anchors and finally went on the rocks. No lives were lost. A preliminary inquiry was held, but no formal investigation, as the severity of the weather accounted for the vessel dragging her anchors. With regard to the "Drumbain," the court of inquiry stated their opinion that the vessel being light, and five feet by the stern, the sea and wind prevented her making good her course. This goes to show that, in setting the course, allowance should have been made for the drift caused by wind and sea; and, as such allowance was not made, the vessel did not make good her course. No lives were lost.

House adjourned at twenty minutes past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

Trade "Corners"—Amendment of Gaming Act.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the results of the cotton corner, he will consider the advisability of introducing a measure to amend the Gaming Act of 1892, so as to prohibit what is termed bear selling and render illegal fictitious contracts in options, futures, and warrants, and making the differences irrecoverable at law.

(Answered by Mr. Gerald Balfour.) I am not prepared to recommend legislation on this subject.

Refusals of Publicans' Licences.

Mr. CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state in how many cases in England and Wales the renewal of victuallers' licences was refused last year on the ground that they were not required (after allowing for the results of appeals); and what proportion this number bears to the total number of such licences.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Akers-Douglas.) The only information in my possession on the points put by the hon. Member is contained in the Return of Licences Refused issued last year (Parliamentary Paper No. 194). From the summary of that Return it appears that in 167 cases the licensing justices refused the renewal of victuallers' licences on the ground that they were not required. For the purposes of the appeal figures it is not possible to distinguish between those cases and the 169 other cases in which licences were refused on the ground that they were not required, coupled with other grounds. Taking these 336 refusals together it may be estimated from the body of the Return that in about 100 cases an appeal was allowed. This would leave about 230 cases in which the licences were finally refused; and, on the figures shown in the last annual Report of the Board of Inland Revenue, viz.: 67,055 victuallers' licences granted in the year 1902–3, the proportion would be about one in 290.

Publication of Civil Service Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Civil Service Supplementary Estimates will be in the hands of Members.

(Answered by Mr. Victor Cavendish.) The Civil Service Supplementary Estimates have been circulated to-day.

Colonial Life Insurances and Income-Tax Rebate.

Sir SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that the privilege granted to Income-Tax payers, resident in this country, of exemption on premiums of life assurance policies is restricted to policies issued by companies whose head offices are in the United Kingdom, and is not applicable to policies issued by companies established in other parts of the Empire, as in India, Australia, and Canada, he will consider the propriety of extending this privilege to the policies of all Indian and Colonial life assurance companies, which are now treated as foreigners.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) Legislation is required in order to extend to Indian and Colonial insurance companies the exemption from Income-Tax on premiums which is granted to insurance offices in the United Kingdom. I am making inquiries into the conditions under which insurance companies carry on their business in the respective Colonies and in India, with a view to finding out whether in each case the same treatment is accorded to companies with local head offices and companies with head offices in the United Kingdom. Until I am in possession of the result of those inquiries I am unable to make any definite statement as to legislation.

Dismissal of Newtown Stewart Postmaster.

Mr. HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he can state the grounds of the dismissal of W. H. West from the postmastership of Newtown Stewart, in the county of Tyrone; and whether it is his intention, having regard to the importance of the Newtown Stewart post office district, to appoint an official of the Post Office to the vacant position.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) Mr. West's office was declared vacant in consequence of certain frauds having occurred in the office which were rendered possible by his general carelessness and laxity of supervision. I have not yet selected a successor, and I am unable to say whether he will be an officer already in the service or not.

Carriage of Mails between Limerick and Tralee.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will state the amount the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company, previous to amalgamation with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, were receiving from the postal authorities for the carriage of the mails between Limerick and Tralee; how much the latter company now require in order to continue to run trains for the carriage of the mails in this district at hours suitable to the postal authorities; how much have the authorities agreed to pay; and if he will state the amount the company are now receiving for the carriage of some of the mails in this district, and what does the service comprise.

(Answered by Lord Stanley.) The payment to the Waterford, Limerick, and Western Railway Company for conveyance of mails previous to the amalgamation of that company with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company was £1,500 a year, for which a suitable train service was provided. The agreement was terminated by the company at about the time of the amalgamation, and the Great Southern and Western Company demanded £7,161 a year for the maintenance of the former trains. My predecessor was prepared to continue payment on the former terms; but, in view of the refusal of the company to reduce their demand for a suitable service, he had no alternative but to send those mails by railway for which suitable trains were run by the company for their own traffic, and to make the best provision possible for forwarding by road the remainder of the mails. Negotiations are still proceeding with the company as to the payment for the conveyance of those mails which are now sent by railway. The present service by railway includes the conveyance of the day mails in each direction, of the night mails for places between Tralee and Templeglantine, and also of the up-night mails to Limerick on week days.

Appointment of British Consuls at Mukden, Antung, and Tatungkau.

MR. MOON (St. Pancras, N.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any appointments are to be made, or have been made, of British Consuls at Mukden, Antung, and Tatungkau.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) Consular officers will be appointed at Mukden and Antung. Tatungkau will be included in the Consular district of Antung.

Russian Tonnage Dues at Port Arthur.

MR. MOON: To ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether His Majesty's Consul at Niu-chwang has yet furnished a report upon the differential tonnage dues imposed by the Russian authorities at Port Arthur; and, if not, when it is expected.

(Answered by Earl Percy.) A report has been received and is now under consideration.

Coal Tax—Report of Commission on Coal Supplies.

SIR GEORGE NEWNES (Swansea Town): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, on the completion of the evidence with regard to the coal tax before the Royal Commission on our Coal Supplies, he will ask the Commission to furnish a special interim Report on this part of the question.

(Answered by Mr. Austen Chamberlain.) No, Sir; I do not propose to make any representation to the Commissioners in regard to the procedure which they should follow.

Officers' Uniform in the Indian Army.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that under the regulations lately issued regarding changes of uniform in the Indian Army, officers in the supply and transport corps have had to purchase a new uniform costing about £60, which they only wear once or twice a year on official occasions, such as a Viceroy's levee; and whether, in view of the official desire to reduce to a minimum the necessary expenses of officers in the Indian Army, he will consider the advisability of substituting for use in India a simpler uniform of khaki or other material suitable to the climate and less expensive.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) All the Orders issued in 1902–3 regarding changes in uniform in the Indian Army provided that tunics then in use might be continued in wear, without alteration, until worn out. The adoption of a new pattern of full dress uniform, as suggested by the hon. Member, would entail considerable expenditure on every officer of the Indian Army affected. As regards the latter part of the Question, officers wear the same coloured uniform as the rank and file of their regiments, and it would be inadvisable to make a change in this respect.

The Royal Indian Marines.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been directed by the Government of India to complaints brought by petition to the Viceroy, in October, 1902, from the whole of the executive officers in the Royal Indian Marines of the block in promotion and other disabilities affecting their position, especially in promotion to the rank of third grade commander; is he aware of the rate of pay of full lieutenants of six years standing, and of the fact that there are lieutenants of seventeen years service in receipt of only Rs. 250 per mensem; is he aware of the rates of leave pay in England and expenses of uniform on promotion, and that a navigating officer has to share with the Commander the responsibility for the safe navigation of his ship, but receives no increased emoluments; and, if so, will he state whether any reply has been made to these representations; and, if not, whether the Indian Government will favourably consider some revision of these rates of pay.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Brodrick.) The memorials of the executive officers of the Royal Indian Marine have been under consideration for some time, and I have sanctioned certain measures which I hope will improve the conditions of service of those officers. These will be announced in India shortly.

Appointment of Irish Dispensary Doctors.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will consent to the repeal of Section 6 of the Local Government (Ireland) Act of 1902, with a view to the settlement of the difficulty which has arisen in Ireland regarding the appointment of dispensary doctors.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The necessity for this section of the Act was explained by me in the Committee Stage of the Measure on the 12th December, 1902. I cannot for the reasons then stated agree to the repeal of the section.

Amalgamation of Irish Unions.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if it is in contemplation to amalgamate any of the Irish unions; and, if so, whether, before any amalgamations are decided upon, local inquiries will be publicly held by an independent tribunal similar to the Appeal Commission under the Local Government Act.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The general question of the amalgamation of unions is at present the subject of investigation by the Poor Law Commission appointed in May last. A considerable volume of evidence has already been taken in public by the Commission, but until its Report has been presented I am unable to say whether further inquiry will be necessary before effect can be given to any recommendations made by the Commission.

Irish National School Teachers.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say (1) how many male principal teachers of the first division of the first class having incomes (exclusive of residual capitation grant) exceeding £127, and whose average attendance for the previous calendar year was not less than seventy, were in the service of the National Board on the 1st April, 1900 (the date of the introduction of the new system of payments to national teachers); (2) how many of such teachers joined the first of first grade; (3) how many of such teachers did not join the first of first grade; (4) why did not the last-mentioned teachers join the first of first grade according to Rule 200 (e) (5); and (5) why have the last-mentioned teachers (who got good reports) been awarded their increments for the triennial period just ended.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) (1) 265. (2) 197. (3) sixty-eight. (4) and (5). They were not eligible under rule by actual income for joining first of first grade. After the termination of three years from 1st April, 1900, six of these teachers had left the service. Of the remaining sixty-two, eight were promoted to first of first grade from 1st April, 1903; eighteen were not promoted because the average attendance at their schools had fallen below seventy; twenty-eight were not promoted because they could not be recommended by the inspectors, as they did not fulfil the necessary conditions for promotion; and eight were not promoted because the reports on their schools for the preceding three years were not sufficiently satisfactory.

Inquiry into Conduct of Sergeant Byrne of Hookeen.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state what decision was arrived at some time ago respecting the Court of Inquiry instituted into the conduct of Sergeant Byrne, of Hookeen, Loughrea; and will he lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the evidence given on the occasion.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Court of Inquiry found the accused not guilty of the charges preferred against him, and the Inspector-General concurred in the finding of the Court. It it not proposed to lay a Copy of the evidence upon the Table.

North Dublin Union—Supposed Death of an Inmate.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 30th January last a female patient in the infirmary of the North Dublin Union was reported dead; that the nurses in charge who were leaving the premises at the time gave instructions for the body to be removed to the mortuary and doctor's certificate to be made out which was done, and that subsequently, on the removal of another corpse from the mortuary, it was found that the woman was still living; and will he order an inquiry into the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) My hon. friend has been misinformed. The Question has no foundation in fact.

Buncrana Sewerage Scheme.

MR. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the plans for the Buncrana sewerage scheme have been as yet amended and approved of by the Local Government Board; and, if not, what is the cause of the delay in not having these works proceeded with.

(Answered by Mr. Wyndham.) The Board on the 22nd January returned to the district council for amendment a plan for this sewerage scheme, and requested that a specification with estimate and plans in detail might be furnished. These have not yet been supplied to the Board.

Discharge of Sewage into Thames at Sheerness.

SIR JOSEPH DIMSDALE (London): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware of the state of the sewage now being discharged into the River Thames from the military establishments at Sheerness and elsewhere, notwithstanding that the attention of the Secretary of State was, in March, 1903, called to the subject by the Corporation of London as the Port Sanitary Authority; and whether he will state what steps he proposes to take to prevent the continuance of discharge of sewage in its present state.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster). My attention has been drawn to the matter alluded to in the Question. As a similar state of affairs exists all along the lower river in the case of the civil population it is considered inexpedient that the War Department should take action separately from the local civil authorities affected.

Publication of Army Supplementary Estimates.

Mr. BUCHANAN: To ask the Secretary of State for War when the Army Supplementary Estimates will be in the hands of Members.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) This Estimate will be in the hands of Members on Thursday next.

Appointment of Dental Surgeons to First Army Corps.

Sir CARNE RASCH (Essex, Chelmsford): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has any official reports upon the appointment of two dental surgeons to First Army Corps; and whether he will state if it is proposed to increase their number.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) Owing to the satisfactory nature of the reports on the employment of dental surgeons it has been decided to employ eight dentists with the troops serving at Home stations.

Condemned War Office Forage.

Sir CARNE RASCH: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office have taken steps to recover the loss on the condemned forage from Prentis the contractor; why Prentis was allowed to contract for the War Office; whether the Department had any security that the obligation would be carried out; and whether the Department was aware that Underwood was the real contractor in this transaction.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Arnold-Forster.) The necessary steps to recover the loss mentioned are being taken by the legal advisers of the War Department. With regard to the question of Mr. Prentis being allowed to contract with the Department, there was no reason whatever to suppose that he had any connection with Messrs. Underwood, or that the latter was the real contractor. As regards security it is not the custom of the Department to require security outside the terms of the contract for the fulfilment of contract obligations in regard to supplies.

Unauthorised Private Circulation to Members of Parliament of Lord Milner's Despatches.

Mr. BROADHURST (Leicester): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a printed circular, without date, signature, or printer's name, sent by post to Members of Parliament containing the substance of Despatches Nos. 91 and 92 from Lord Milner to the Colonial Secretary, the delivery being made a day or two before the issue of the Blue-book containing these despatches to this House; and, if so, whether he will make inquiries into the means by which the despatches were intercepted and copied by unknown persons.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I have no information on this subject, but I will make inquiries and shall be much assisted in doing so if the hon. Member can supply me with a copy of the circular to which he refers.

Censorship of Private Correspondence in the Transvaal.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the power referred to by his predecessor on the 29th April, 1903, of intercepting and opening letters, documents, and parcels in the Transvaal has been exercised during the last six months; and, if so, in how many instances; and has the proposed amendment of the Ordinance been carried out.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Lyttelton.) I am making inquiry by telegraph as to the various points raised by the hon. Member.

The Agricultural Rates Act.

Sir WALTER THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view o the early expiration of the Agricultural Rating Act, it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill to extend its term or alternatively to make it a permanent enactment.

(Answered by Mr. Walter Long.) Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to answer this Question. The period of the continuance of the Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, was extended in 1901 until the 31st March, 1906, and the Government do not propose to introduce legislation on the subject during the present session.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Imperial Service Order.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will give directions for the publication in the Army List, in the same way as already published in the Navy List respecting naval officers, of a list of officers of the Army and Auxiliary Forces upon whom His Majesty the King has conferred the Imperial Service Order.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER, Belfast, W.): Instructions have been given that the names of recipients of the Imperial Service Order shall in future be shown in the Army List.

War Office Reorganisation.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when does he propose to take the opinion of this House on the scheme for the reorganisation of the War Office.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: The Government will be glad to give the House an opportunity of discussing the scheme of the reorganisation of the War Office when the course of business allows. The Committee, however, have not yet completed their Report, and it will be obviously inconvenient to discuss the scheme proposed by them except as a whole. The reorganisation of the War Office is an administrative matter, and for the most part does not require legislative sanction; but the transfer to the Council of certain statutory powers vested in the Secretary of State for War must be effected by Act of Parliament. Probably it will be convenient to raise a discussion on the introduction of the Bill which must be brought forward for this purpose. I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will raise the Question again when the Prime Minister returns to the House.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): Will the discussion of the part of the Report dealing with the Cabinet Committee of Defence be in order on that Bill.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I do not know how far the Orders of the House will allow it, but I believe there are proposals in this first part which will require legislation.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: Will any money be asked for and will any statement be made by the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Estimates.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: No money will be required at this stage, and I doubt whether it will be required at a later stage. But if I find that money is required I will make a statement. My opinion at present is that no money will be required.

MR. REGINALD LUCAS (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what provision has been made for the officers whose services at the War Office have been dispensed with under the new scheme; what arrangements have been made for the conduct of business during the period of transition from the old system to the new, and to secure that the Department may be prepared for any national emergency which may arise.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: Field-Marshal Lord Roberts, at the special request of the Prime Minister, has consented to place his services at the disposal of the Committee of Imperial Defence. General Sir Henry Brackenbury has retired at the conclusion of his period of service. General Sir William Nicholson, whose period of service would have expired on 1st May of the present year, has been specially selected to be attached to the Japanese forces during the present war, to represent the Intelligence Department. No further appointments of the nature referred to in the Question have been made at present. Arrangements have been made for the conduct of business during the period of transition from the old system to the new, and it is not anticipated that the work of the Department will be interrupted. I may remind my hon. friend that the patent constituting the new authority was only sealed on the 8th inst., and that the first meeting of the Army Council was held yesterday.

South African War Medals.

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the medals and clasps given for the South African War will be all issued, including those for the South African regiments raised in South Africa.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I am afraid that it is not possible to say when the issue of these medals and clasps will be completed. Medal rolls are still coming in and there are several more to come, great difficulty being experienced in some cases in finding officers who can prepare and certify rolls. I do not think in this case there has been any undue or unavoidable delay.

SIR GEORGE BARTLEY: Is it not the fact that some regiments which went right through the war have not yet received sufficient medals?

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: If the hon. Member can inform me of any cases I will inquire if they come under the exceptional cases I have mentioned.

Malta and Gibraltar Barracks Sanitary Condition.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will communicate to the House the reports made by the officers commanding the Royal Engineers and principal medical officers at Malta and Gibraltar upon the sanitary condition of the barracks in those commands in the years 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, and state what steps have been taken to remedy the evils brought to notice in those reports regarding the structural defects of the buildings and the need for improved water supply for the use of the troops.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: The reports in question are confidential. I can, however, assure the House that the proper steps are being taken to remedy the various defects. Large sums of money have been spent in the improvements of these barracks. The only serious cases of the nature referred to by the hon. Member which have been brought to notice are:—Gibraltar: Brewery Barracks reported as insanitary. These are about to be replaced. Malta: Fort Manoel reported as being in an insanitary condition. This will be evacuated as soon as a third Infantry battalion barrack can be built at Pembroke Camp. As regards the water supply only a few defects have been reported and they have been or are being remedied.

Effects of Deceased Soldiers.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a watch, the property of the late Quartermaster-Sergeant J. Macleod, which was handed over by the hospital authorities at Klerksdorp to Lieutenant W. Gates, late of the 14th Company Imperial Yeomanry, for despatch to the deceased soldier's father, resident in Ross-shire, has failed to reach its destination; whether, seeing that, although Lieutenant Gates states that the parcel was registered and posted at Klerksdorp about the end of March, 1902, he is unable to produce the registered receipt issued in such cases, and that the post office authorities at Klerksdorp deny all knowledge of the parcel, he will consider the expediency of granting compensation; and will he state the nature of the War Office regulations which govern the disposal of the personal effects of soldiers dying on active service in the field, and will he state under what authority Lieutenant Gates acted.

*MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: It has already been decided to grant £2 as compensation for the watch and a belt, and orders have been given for the money to be paid. Under the Regimental Debts Act, 1893, any effects not disposed of locally are sent to the next of kin, and the watch in question was handed to Lieutenant Gates for this purpose. Considerable operations were in progress in the Klerksdorp district of the Transvaal at the time in question and means of communication were uncertain.

Rosyth Naval Base.

SIR JOHN LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Civil Lord of the Admiralty whether, in connection with the naval base at Rosyth on the Forth, sufficient land has been acquired for the erection of dwellings for the officers and workpeople; and whether it is intended to lay out the ground on hygienic principles, to prevent overcrowding, and secure abundance of light and air.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. ARTHUR LEE, Hampshire, Fareham): The plans of the Admiralty are not sufficiently advanced to allow of any definite information being given as to the utilisation of the land, but a portion of it will probably be available for workmen's dwellings. The Admiralty have not at present any intention of erecting such dwellings themselves, but they will take care that any dwellings erected on their property are arranged and constructed with due regard to hygienic principles.

Indian Police Service.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Report of the Commission on Indian Police Organisation which took evidence last year, and the resolution thereon of the Governor-General in Council, will be placed before Parliament early this session; and whether the recommendations of that Commission include proposals for admission, by promotion or otherwise, of experienced Indian members of that service to any of its three higher grades, or any modifications of the present system under which youthful Europeans, selected in this country without previous knowledge of India and its races, are, on appointment, posted directly to the higher ranks of the police service.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I do not anticipate that it will be possible to lay the Report of the Indian Police Commission before Parliament early this session, or to make any statement on the subject, as I must await the recommendations of the Government of India. The whole subject is being carefully considered in communication with the local governments.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to give the House the information before the debate on the Budget?

MR. BRODRICK: Which debate?

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: The debate on the Indian Budget—at the end of the session?

MR. BRODRICK: I will do my best.

The Transvaal Labour Ordinance—Protests.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the House is now in possession of all the various protests from public authorities, departments, and associations in South Africa respecting the introduction of Chinese labour which have been received by his Department; and, if not, will he place those not yet communicated before the House.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): A few adverse resolutions from the Cape and one from Lydenburg in the Transvaal have reached me since Cd. 1895 was published, but they were not in time to be added to the further Papers which were circulated yesterday.

MR. JOHN ELLIS was understood to ask what bodies sent in the adverse resolutions.

Copy of the Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies where a complete and accurate copy of the Ordinance respecting Chinese labour in the Transvaal as it finally left the Transvaal Legislative Council can be found.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: The Ordinance, reconstructed as far as is known accurately, will be found in Cd. 1898. Lord Milner has telegraphed that no further Amendments have been introduced, and there is, consequently, no doubt that this amended version of the Ordinance correctly represents the Legislature actually passed. The amended version has been circulated for some days.

Transvaal Recruiting and Transit Regulations.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in possession of and will communicate to the House the steps which Lord Milner proposes should be taken with regard to recruiting labour in China for the Transvaal so as to ensure that before the labourers leave China they are made fully aware of the specific wages they are to be paid and of the very special restrictions under which their labour is to be performed.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Lord Milner informs me that it is certainly intended that the Transvaal Government shall exercise the closest supervision over arrangements for recruitment and treatment of labourers in transit, and that it has been thought advisable to await arrival of Evans before drawing up the terms upon which license to import will be granted, and to be advised by him in regard to all details as to the qualifications of agents, the methods of recruitment, and treatment on voyage. These will be embodied in regulations under the Ordinance as well as in license.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Perthshire, E.): How can the Transvaal Government enforce any regulation with regard to sea transport? Must it not be done by Imperial regulation?

*Mr. LYTTELTON: The position is this: negotiations are now in progress with the Chinese Government. One of the demands of the Chinese Government was with reference to sea transit, and there would be no sort of difficulty in making proper arrangements with regard to transit with that Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN: Still it must be arranged by the Imperial Government and not by the Transvaal.

Barbados as a Recruiting Ground for Native Labour for the Transvaal.

Mr. NORMAN (Wolverhampton, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has received communications from any of His Majesty's representatives in the West Indies informing him that British native labour is available there for the Transvaal Colony; if so, will he state the purport of such communication, and what reply has been made to it.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: I have received a despatch from the Governor of Barbados asking whether he may permit steps to be taken for recruiting labourers in Barbados for service in South Africa. No reply has yet been made to this despatch pending reference to Lord Milner on the subject.

Mr. NORMAN: In sending the despatch did the Governor of Barbados express any opinion as to the desirability or otherwise?

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Yes.

Mr. NORMAN: In favour?

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Yes, Sir.

Mr. MALCOLM (Suffolk, Stowmarket): Did he say how many recruits he could get?

Mr. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Has the import of labourers into Barbados been stopped?

British Workmen and the Transvaal Labour Ordinance.

*Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information to the effect that a party of British workmen who sailed for England from the Cape last Wednesday, have been dismissed from their employment on the Rand mines for having refused to sign a petition in favour of Chinese labour.

*MR. LYTTELTON: No, Sir; but I have to-day received the following telegram from Lord Milner:—I am requested to transmit to you by telegraph following resolution passed unanimously at a general meeting of Association of Mine Managers of the Witwatersrand held today: Begins—Resolved that the Association of Mine Managers having read Mr. Herbert Samuel's Question in the House of Commons regarding the dismissal of British workmen from the Witwatersrand mines because of their refusal to sign pro-Chinese petition, emphatically state that nothing of the kind ever took place. Upwards of 7,000 mine workmen signed the petition and neither on these nor on the 4,000 to 5,000 who did not, was any pressure directly or indirectly brought to bear—Ends.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: May I say that my Question was based on a telegram from the Cape correspondent of—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Transvaal Legislative Council and the Ordinance.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received from Lord Milner a despatch giving the reason which induced the Legislative Council of the Transvaal drastically to amend the Labour Ordinance; and when he will put the House in possession of these reasons.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I have not yet received such a despatch from Lord Milner; I will lay it on the Table when I have received it. I do not consider the Amendments to have been of a drastic character.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Whether drastic or not no explanation has been sent.

Cost of Cable Transvaal Ordinance Amendments.

MR. NORMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state what was the cost of the telegram No. 4 (Cd. 1898), addressed by Governor Viscount Milner to himself, No. 2 of the 5th February, containing the Amendments to the draft Ordinance concerning Chinese labour in the Transvaal Colony.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The cost was about £150.

Chinese Government and the Transvaal Labour Question.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Chinese Government has now given its assent to the proposed recruiting of Chinese labour for the Transvaal under the conditions laid down in the Labour Ordinance.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Earl PERCY, Kensington, S.): As I stated in reply to a Question by the hon. Member for Cleveland yesterday,† His Majesty's Government have been informed by the Chinese Minister that the draft Ordinance contains nothing which is likely to conflict with the proposals he may have to make when the time comes for negotiating the regulations provided for in the Treaty of Pekin. Papers on the subject are being laid.

Ex Soldiers in the Postal Service.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he can state what Army Service men who took Post Office service during 1891 and 1892, under what was termed the Ferguson Act, are entitled to add to Post Office service for assessment of pension.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Lord STANLEY, Lancashire, Westhoughton): I do not know to what Act of Parliament the hon. Member's Question refers; but if he will give me fuller particulars I shall be happy to give him the information he desires. I may, however, state that the various schemes, which have from time to time been put in force for the employment of soldiers in the Post Office, have never included any arrangements for adding military service to Post Office service for the assessment of pension.

New Lady Inspector in the Potteries.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state what will be the duties of the new lady inspector in the Potteries, at whose request has she been appointed, and what will be her position in relation to the present inspector of the district.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The duties of the lady inspector, who has by my directions, been detailed from the existing staff to spend some time in the Potteries district, are to secure the observance, so far as regards the employment of women and girls, of the provisions of the Factory and Truck Acts generally, and, in particular, of the Special Rules now in force in the industry. She will act in concert with the district inspector under the general instructions laid down for the lady inspectors.

MR. COGHILL: How long is the lady inspector to remain at the Potteries?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: As long as is deemed necessary.

MR. COGHILL: On whose recommendation was she sent there?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I determined to send her there because I thought it desirable.

MR. COGHILL: But at whose instance?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order! The Question on the Paper has been answered.

Deaths from Lead Poisoning.

MR. COGHILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state the total number of deaths in 1903 from lead poisoning in the china and earthenware trade and in the trade of house painters and plumbers; and whether he proposes to institute any legislation this session with regard to the trade of house painters and plumbers.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: The number of deaths from lead poisoning in the pottery trade in 1903 was three. The trade of house painters and plumbers does not come within the Factory Act and returns of deaths are not required to be made to the Home Office. It appears, however, from information supplied by the Registrars of Deaths, that there were in the same year in the whole of the United Kingdom thirty-nine cases in which the death of persons stated to be employed in this trade was attributed directly or indirectly to lead poisoning. I do not propose to introduce legislation this session with regard to this trade.

MR. COGHILL was understood to ask why the right hon. Gentleman took no steps with regard to a trade well known to be more dangerous than other trades to which he was paying attention?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that when a trade regulated by statute was known to be dangerous it was the special duty of the Home Office to keey it closelp under observation.

MR. COGHILL proceeded to put another Question.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question on the Paper has been answered.

Scottish Deer Forests.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state how many acres have been added to the deer forest area in each of the crofting counties since the last Deer Forest Return was published.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am not in a position to give the hon. Member the information he desires.

Farranakilla National Schools.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the cause of the delay in building the Farranakilla National Schools, county Kerry, seeing that all necessary preliminaries were completed before March, 1902; whether he is aware that owing to the condition of the school the average attendance has fallen from 102 in January, 1901, to eighty-eight in January, 1903, that parents have threatened to withdraw their children altogether owing to the condition of the school, and that it is at present roofed with corrugated iron, and is neither rain proof nor wind proof; and whether, in view of the urgency of this case, immediate steps will be taken to have the new school built.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The applicant for a grant to build the proposed schoolhouse has elected to wait until the new building plans have been sanctioned. The Commissioners are not aware that parents have threatened to withdraw their children from the school. It is a fact, however, that the attendance has fallen off, as stated. The Irish Government is in correspondence with the Treasury on the general question of the issue of building grants, and I hope to be in a position very shortly to make an announcement on the subject.

Sanitation of Kilkee.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether those who held the sworn inquiry into the sanitary condition of Kilkee, which was held last June, have issued a report, and whether another sworn inquiry on the same subject has been ordered; and, if so, what is the reason for the second inquiry, and at whose expense it will be held.

MR. WYNDHAM: The local shorthand writer, employed to take notes of the evidence given at the inquiry, failed to furnish a transcript to the inspectors. They were unable consequently to make a report. Another inquiry has been ordered. The question of the incidence of the cost cannot be decided pending a decision on the report and evidence.

Irish Asylum Loans.

MR. CHARLES DEVLIN (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the high rate of interest charged on loans required in connection with asylums in Ireland; and if a reduction in the rate of interest is contemplated.

MR. WYNDHAM: No alteration is at present contemplated in the conditions on which these loans are made.

Police Protection at Carrigeen.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Peter Morrissey, of Carrigeen, near Craughwell, is presumably under police protection; that a special police hut, containing four policemen, was set up some years ago, and is still maintained, for his sole protection; that Morrissey for several years back has remonstrated against this protection; and, if so, will he say whether any part of the cost of the police will be charged to the people of the district; and when may Peter Morrissey expect a release from this protection.

MR. WYNDHAM: This man was afforded special protection because such was considered necessary in the opinion of the local responsible authorities. It was discontinued last week under circumstances which satisfied the authorities that the step could safely be taken. No portion of the cost incurred is chargeable to the district.

Kinvara Harbour.

MR. DUFFY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to the interview which recently took place between the county council of Galway and a number of gentlemen representing the Harbour of Kinvara; and whether, in view of the injury to trading which has taken place in the district owing to the condition of the quay, he will at once take steps to remedy the present state of affairs.

MR. WYNDHAM: It was not until the 6th instant that the county council passed a resolution undertaking to make a contribution towards the cost of repairing Kinvara Pier. The matter is now receiving attention.

Fair Rents in County Cork.

MR. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact of farmers in the Millstreet rural district served originating notices to have fair rents fixed during the past two years, and that they have received no intimation as to when their application will be heard, he can state when the consideration of these cases will be undertaken by the Land Commission.

Mr. WYNDHAM: The hearing of cases from this district will commence at Millstreet on the 26th instant.

Gaya Bay.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, having regard to the fact that coal is available in British North Borneo, will he say whether the Defence Committee have yet considered the expediency of acquiring some portion of the Chartered Company's territory, with a view to the establishment of a Naval station at Gaya Bay.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS (for Mr. A. J. Balfour) said the proceedings of the Defence Committee were necessarily of a confidential character and he could not therefore answer the Question.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

[ELEVENTH DAY.]

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

Question again proposed.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL (Yorkshire, Cleveland) said it was from no choice of hon. Members on his side of the House that that discussion on the Chinese labour question was taking place on an Amendment to the Address. They would have infinitely preferred an opportunity when Party ties were not so strong, and when the Party whip did not crack so loud. Right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench had again and again pressed for some other opportunity for that debate, but just as the Government had refused to permit a free vote in the Transvaal, so they had refused to permit a free vote in the House of Commons. The fault was not theirs that they were obliged to proceed in that manner. He would also like to be allowed to say that in making that Motion they were animated by no prejudice against the gold mines, as such. They had no desire to hamper their prosperity and he for one could fully endorse the remark of Lord Milner that they should be willing to adopt any measures—any reasonable measures—for the assistance of the gold mines, which were not in themselves intolerable. But they held that this measure which was proposed was in itself intolerable, and not only intolerable but also unnecessary. These were the two propositions he should set out to prove. He had no wish to use hard words concerning the Chinese nation as a whole. Anyone who had made a study of Chinese characteristics was aware that the educated classes of that nation—the wealthier classes—had many amiable and admirable qualities. They were possessed of great courtesy, of fortitude, of patience. Their integrity in commerce, their respect for literature were well known. But the class of Chinamen who were accustomed to emigrate were in the main a degraded people. They were vicious, immoral, and unclean. Their only amusements were gambling and opium smoking. Wherever they went they carried with them those qualities, and wherever they settled in white communities they were hated. That was the universal experience—an experience not merely in one case but in all, in Australia, in New Zealand, in he United States, in Canada — everywhere the presence of Chinamen had been found by white men to be intolerable. This was not a small question—a question of the importation of a small number of Chinese. They heard it said that the demand was merely for 10,000 Chinese labourers, but there was no such limit in the Ordinance, and when the Colonial Secretary was asked in that House if he would impose such a limitation of numbers he definitely declined to do so. It was true that in the Ordinance the employment of Chinese was limited to the one district of the Rand, but it was very doubtful if it could be permanently limited in that manner. Lord Milner only last June said that he wished to employ Asiatics on public works. An Ordinance had been passed in Rhodesia for the importation of the Chinese and only awaited the Royal assent, and if mines in other districts were opened they would have a demand for Chinese to be employed which it would be difficult to resist. But even if that proposal were limited to the Rand mines it would be seen that it was not merely a question of the importation of 5,000 or 10,000 Chinese. A Royal Commission in the Transvaal had considered this matter, and the Majority Report pointed out that the present deficiency of labour in the mines amounted to 129,000 men. In five years time an additional 196,000 men would be required—making in all 300,000 labourers needed in five years. That statement had been endorsed by the Chamber of Mines and in a speech by Sir George Farrar, who was the leader of the pro-Chinese party in the Transvaal. They could not keep 300,000 men in a ring fence. No matter what their restrictions might be, they could not keep such a multitude of men in close permanent confinement. They must mix with the neighbouring white population, and with the native black population. He did not wish to dwell on a distasteful subject, but he asked the House to imagine what would be the effect of that vast body of men living together, and belonging to a race admittedly immoral. He had asked the Secretary for the Colonies if he would secure an alteration in the regulations to the effect that any Chinaman who wished to do so should have the right to bring his wife and family with him on the same terms as he came himself. But the right hon. Gentleman declined to give any such pledge. Although he said he would endeavour to secure reasonable facilities for the introduction of women he distinctly declined to pledge himself that any labourer who wished to take his family with him should have a right to do so. The right hon. Gentleman shook his head, but if he would refer to his answer and the Question he would see that he used the words: "I cannot give the pledge which the hon. Member asks." That being so, they would inevitably have moral evils arising, and he ventured to assert deliberately that if the Ordinance was passed in its present form they would be inoculating Africa with the worst vices of Asia.

Now let them look at the terms of the Ordinance, and from the standpoint of the labourers themselves. He was sure that hon. Members opposite, who were inclined to support the measure, could not have realised the provisions of the Ordinance. In the first place, the labourer was not to be allowed to be employed in any occupation other than that of unskilled labour in the mines, therefore he had no opportunity of improving his position. But that was the smallest of the restrictions. He could be transferred and assigned from one master to another, but there was nothing in the Ordinance to secure that his consent should be given to the transfer. When the Ordinance was first introduced there was a clause in it that the labourer's consent should be required before he could be transferred from one master to another, but when the Ordinance was being passed through the Legislative Council that clause was struck out. Thus the masters might transfer a man from one to another as though he was a chattel, but on the other hand the labourer could not change his master if he wished to do so. When once he had signed his contract he could not terminate it so long as it lasted. He could not give notice to one employer and go to another. If he struck work he could be arrested and imprisoned. He was bound to reside on the premises of his employer in charge of a manager appointed for the purpose; he could never leave the premises without permission, which might or might not be granted, and, in any case, he could never leave for more than forty-eight hours at a time. If he escaped, he might be tracked down, arrested without warrant and imprisoned by a magistrate, while anyone who harboured or concealed an escaped labourer might be arrested and fined £50, or imprisoned in default of payment. Apparently the Transvaal Government had gone to the Statute-books of the slave States of America for a model for their Ordinance. The labourer might not be permitted by the importer to take his wife and family with him, and should they desire to join him afterwards and go to South Africa for the purpose, they might reach the shores of Natal, but they would not be allowed to land. They would be sent back. He asked the House, and he especially appealed to hon. Members opposite with whom the responsibility for this decision would largely rest, whether this Ordinance was not an enormity to be placed on the Statute-book of a British Colony. They would be told that the labourers would sign the contracts of their own free will, that the conditions would be fully explained to them, and that they need not go unless they chose. But these labourers were not a highly intelligent people, and he very much doubted if they could be made to understand the real meaning of the Ordinance. Even if they did, however, that was no justification for establishing such a condition of affairs. There was an edict of the Emperor Diocletian to the effect that no Roman citizen should be allowed to sell himself into slavery. That was a wise edict, it was not an infringement but a safeguard of liberty. But in this case they were not prohibiting—they were inviting the Chinese to sell themselves into slavery. It might be said that that there was freedom of contract—but there were cases in which freedom of contract might really be a contraction of freedom. If the Ordinance passed into law how should we be able to hold up our heads in the face of foreign criticism. The Frenchman and the German would say: "You English set yourselves up as teachers of humanity to the world at large. You condemn the harsh Government of Russia, you pass resolutions against the cruelties of Turkey, you circularise the Powers about the administration of the Congo Free State, but look at your own newest colonies; see how you keep your unskilled labourers there—like beasts in a stable—prisoners in gaol, like what Mill once called a 'human cattle farm.'" He did not think that would redound to the greatness or glory of the British Empire, that it would add to its prestige, or raise the honour of its name. Then, again, they were told that they must have these severe restrictions or the Chinese would overrun the country, would enter into all occupations, and would undersell the whites. It was true. They were in this dilemma, either the Chinese must be serfs or a danger. He did not know which alternative was the worse. But there was a third alternative, that which he would ask the House to adopt, and that was to have nothing to do with the scheme at all.

These were the moral and ethical objections to the proposal; and they must always have the first place in any question of policy. But there were also political objections to be considered. When the war was over it was recognised that the greatest danger to the future of South Africa was the fact that the Boers constituted a majority of the population in the Transvaal, and that they were a race which increased more rapidly in numbers than the British. To obviate this difficulty and danger the Yeomanry were invited to settle on the land; emigration was to be encouraged; an association was formed to send out English women to South Africa to get employment, and ultimately to be married there. Every effort was in fact to be made to increase the British population in order to act as a political counterbalancing force to the large number of Boers. What, however, were they doing now that they had a natural economic attraction for the British population? They were slamming the door in the face of their British population. That meant an indefinite postponement of the self-government in the Transvaal to which as a nation we stood pledged. Besides, if this measure were introduced without the formal consent of the people of the Transvaal, the mine-owners would be more than ever afraid of the establishment of self-government. Their fortunes would be resting on a basis of Chinese labour. Self-government might destroy that foundation. It might lead to a reaction, and the people might insist, as they had insisted in Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and the United States, that this immigration of Chinese should cease. Consequently the whole influence of the mine-owners would be thrown into the scale against the introduction of self-government. They knew to their cost how great that influence was. There was a further political objection. The Federation of South Africa had long been an ideal they had wished to attain.

The history of the movement had been long and chequered. There had been many attempts to secure this object, which was not only desirable in itself, but which was a necessary step in the Federation of the Empire as a whole. If they had not self-government in the Transvaal they could not have the Federation of South Africa. And even if they secured self-government in the Transvaal they would still be faced by a great obstacle in the way of federation. Immigration was naturally a federal matter. In Germany, in Canada, in the United States, and in the Australian Commonwealth it had been treated federally. But he did not believe the Cape would tolerate Chinese labour. He would ask the House to listen to the strong and emphatic declaration of Cape Ministers on this subject. In a telegram to the Colonial Secretary they said—

> "In relation to the policy of British South African Federation, which Ministers are most earnestly pursuing, they cannot but feel that the importation of Asiatics will greatly hamper its consummation, as it will introduce a highly discordant element between the European communities which will certainly complicate, if not altogether prevent, the union of all the Colonies under a central Administration."

That was a grave declaration which the House should not fail to note. Morally, socially, and politically they held that this measure was intolerable. Economically it was unnecessary as well. It seemed to be assumed among the commercial classes in this country that in the Transvaal at the present time everything was stagnant and at a standstill, that the mines were hardly working, and that the country was in the throes of a most severe economic crisis. That view was based on despatches from Lord Milner in December and January last, in which he said—

> "The immediate prospect is very bad. There is a complete stagnation in commerce and enterprise owing to the labour difficulty."

Lord Milner also spoke of "a crisis," of "grave distress," of "an inevitable exodus of the white population." But let the House contrast that with what Lord Milner said in the preceding June. At that time a deputation waited on him, and in the course of his reply, he said—

> "It is an unfortunate circumstance that so many people seem unable to discuss this question of fact in a temperate manner, that they become partisans, so to speak, of a particular solution, and, while exaggerating everything that makes in favour of that solution, decline to see the plainest arguments on the other side. To listen to some of the extreme advocates of Asiatic labour you would think that this place was on the verge of total ruin. What is really the case? The production of gold even now is greater than in 1895 or 1896, when the Transvaal already was, and had been for some time, the marvel of the world in the matter of gold production. The world progresses, no doubt, but what was fabulous wealth seven years ago is not abject poverty to-day."

What had happened in the six months that had elapsed since those words were spoken? Had the gold production diminished? Had the number of labourers decreased? Let them compare the returns of December and June. The gold production had increased from 237,000 ozs. in June to 286,000 ozs. in December, an increase of 20 per cent. The number of labourers in the same period had increased from 59,400 to 68,800, an increase of 16 per cent. The production to-day was not what it was in 1895 or 1896 when Lord Milner said the wealth was fabulous, or in 1897 when it had largely increased, but it was on the same scale as in the first half of 1898, and there was only one year in all its history—the year from the middle of 1898 down to the beginning of the war, when there was a larger production of gold in the Transvaal than at the present moment. Lord Milner had long been more or less of a partisan of Asiatic labour. Last June, however, he had to suppress to some extent the movement for introducing Asiatic labour into the Transvaal. Now he was encouraging it. What was the reason for his change of policy? It was not because there had been no increase in the production of gold or in the number of labourers, but because last June he had to deal with a Colonial Minister who was personally opposed to the introduction of Chinese labour; and now there was a Secretary of State in office more amenable to pressure and advice. It was true that the number of labourers in the Transvaal was now considerably smaller than it was before the war, but then a smaller number was needed in view of the improved means of production. Owing to the enforcement of the liquor laws, better organisation, and a larger use of machinery, the production per labourer per month now was four ounces of gold.

In 1899 it was 3·4 ounces—an increase of one-seventh. That was an important item, because it showed that in all these figures they had to consider the fact that the production of six labourers now was equal to seven labourers then. He did not deny that there was some depression in the Transvaal at present. After the war there was great inflation. There was much money spent on the building of houses, in re-opening the mines, and repairing the disasters of the war; much Imperial money was spent and circulated in the country, but that had now been stopped. There had also been a drought in South Africa. All these things tended to cause a natural depression. He did not deny, also, that there was a shortage of labour for the Transvaal mines, and that more labourers could be employed if they were forthcoming, that more enterprises could be undertaken if there were more labourers, and that new industries could be started. But there was no crisis, nothing that called for extreme measures.

He did not propose to enter into the question whether or not it was possible to secure more native labourers. His hon. friends who were to follow him would go into that important controversy on the possibility of getting more Kaffirs—the influence of the reduction of wages, of the accumulation of money by the natives during the war, the methods of recruitment, the terribly high rate of mortality on the Rand. The statement was not yet proved that no more labour was obtainable from the Kaffirs of South Africa. But if they liked he would assume the truth of that statement. He would assume that the reports of the Bloemfontein Conference and of the majority of the Royal Commission were correct. He would assume that the native labour supply in South Africa had been absolutely exhausted, and that not one more Kaffir could be obtained from any source. Still he asserted that there was no necessity for this measure. He might be asked—Do you take a merely negative attitude, and say that there is to be no further increase in the labour supply? He could conceive of hon. Members taking that attitude, and saying "Rather than accept these Chinese slaves we would prefer that the gold should remain in the ground." That was not the argument he would address to the House. His argument was that if there were no more Kaffirs the mines could still be worked at a profit, not by Chinese labour, but by a larger employment of white labour. He would try to prove that proposition to the House. He knew many hon. Members opposite held the view that it was impossible to employ white labour at unskilled work in South Africa, because white men would not work side by side with Kaffirs at the same employment. It was true that white men would not work side by side with Kaffirs; whites and blacks would no more mix than oil and water. But white men could be employed in one part of a mine and black men in another part at the same class of work. This was not merely conjecture or prophecy. It was experience. It was not a question whether white men would do unskilled work in South Africa, but whether they had done it. Mr. Creswell, the manager of a mine, who had made the experiment, said—

> "Since the war I have had a large number of men working for me, and have had practically the whole of my surface works run by white men to enable me to put almost the whole complement of my natives underground. Underground I have also had white men, replacing natives as machine-drill helpers, shovelling and tramming, and helping the timber-men. In all these departments the men have on the whole worked well."

The evidence would be found in the Blue-book of the General Manager of the Rand Mines, Limited, who had had over 400 unskilled white labourers working in his mine for many months. Then there was the report of the Government Mining Engineer (page 193) who said—

> "In the majority of the crushing mills the native has been entirely replaced by the European."

There they had the fact recorded on the authority of the Government engineer that in one important department Kaffir work had been replaced by unskilled white labour in most of the mines on the Rand. They had also the fact that the Government had had a large number of English navvies and 200 Boers employed on earthworks on railways in South Africa. They could not get over facts. He hoped they would hear no more of the exploded superstition that white men would not do what was called Kaffir work. Hundreds of them had been doing work which was supposed to be derogatory to white men, and which should be limited only to the blacks. Then they were told that white labour was obviously too costly. They were asked "Can you afford to work a mine if you pay a white man 10s. a day for work which the Kaffir does for 2s. 6d.? How can a mine be made to pay with white labour on such terms?" Of course if they merely replaced a Kaffir by a white man, doing the same work, obviously the cost of production went up fourfold. Many figures could be quoted, and doubtless would be quoted, showing that the cost of production was largely increased when white men were employed, but almost all these figures were based on the employment of irregular soldiers who were engaged on what were really relief works. After the war, a large number of irregular soldiers were left in the Transvaal without employment, and, in response to an appeal from Lord Kitchener, the mine managers provided work for many of these men. But just as in this country we did not expect to get economical work from men who were engaged on relief works for the unemployed, so in South Africa the cost of the work done by the irregular soldiers who were not accustomed to that class of work, was extremely high. They would be told, also, that the British navvies were taken out to do work on the railways and that these men were found to be so costly that they had to be sent home. It would be seen from the reports of the engineers at page 110 of the Blue-book that—

> "These men are not navvies at all, and are determined to loaf through their year's agreement. . . . Among these so-called navvies there are a number of men who appear to have come out with the intention of doing no work."

Under the circumstances these gangs of navvies were bound to prove unsatisfactory. In any case the making of earthworks on railways was work requiring sheer brute force. If white men were employed in the mines they could use mechanical devices which could not be used if black men were employed. The general manager of the Rand Mines, referring to the Boers, reported that they—

> "Have generally performed their work very satisfactorily, and although receiving much larger pay than the average native, in certain cases, as shown in the contracting for shovelling and tramming underground, they have proved nearly as economical as regards cost per ton as native labour."

Mr. Creswell, who made his experiment under many adverse circumstances, reported that labour in the cyanide works of his mine was 5·3d. per ton when Kaffirs were employed, and 4·9d. when whites were employed. Labour in the mill cost 4·8d. with the Kaffirs and 4·2d. with the whites. In developing and stoping, which was the actual work of mining underground, the cost per ton mined of machine drill contract work was 6s. 4d. with Kaffirs and 6s. 9d. with white men, an infinitesimal difference which the industry could well afford to bear. If white men were employed with Kaffir methods the expense would be heavy, but if white men were employed with white methods then they could arrive at economy. In the Transvaal, as in all cases where there had been a large and plentiful supply of cheap labour, few attempts had been made to economise labour. There was absolutely no attempt at mechanical haulage underground in any mine except that, and the much-abused Mr. Creswell had introduced a system of electrical haulage in the Village Main Reef mine.

At the Annual Meeting of the Rand Mines on 25th March, 1903, the Chairman, Sir J. Percy Fitzpatrick, who was a leader of the Chinese party, quoted and endorsed a statement of Mr. Eckstein, which had previously been made, to the following effect—

> "It is not yet entirely satisfactory, I admit, and we all acknowledge the cost, and in some respect, the unatisfactoriness of the machine-drill, but the experience is a comparatively recent one; we are improving all the time, and I think we may reasonably look forward to the introduction of a small stope-drill which will aid us immensely in solving our labour difficulty.

> "That by the development of the machine-drill we can cut down our native labour to a very large extent—50,000 or 60,000 natives" who would be replaced by a very much smaller number of skilled white miners. That was not the statement of a mere partisan of white labour. Why should these goldfields in South Africa be the only goldfields in the world which it was impossible to work with white labour; which could only be worked by employing some subordinate race? There were goldfields in America and Australia. Were there natural difficulties in the way of winning the gold on the Rand which did not exist in America or Australia? If hon. Members would turn to the Minority Report of the Labour Commission they would see quoted a statement of Mr. W. H. Hall, who was for ten years State Engineer of California and Supervising Engineer to the United States Geological Survey, and was now in the employ of the Consolidated Goldfields of South Africa, and H. Eckstein & Co., and a distinguished American expert, who said—

> "Judging from long experience, the natural conditions and circumstances under which this mining is prosecuted may well be compared with those surrounding and affecting the cost of working auriferous lodes, veins, or ledges in the Rocky Mountains and Pacific Slope States of America. The methods of mining and reducing the banket ores here are practically the same as those followed in American quartz mining. Having made such comparisons, from my own personal knowledge I have no hesitation in saying that the conditions—so far as nature has made them—under which the industry which is here developing, viewing the Witwatersrand fields as a whole, are decidedly more favourable than those present, and affecting the cost of similar mining, as a general thing, in America."

and then he went on to say—

> "If gold is not obtained here at less cost, the reason is to be found in the shortcomings of man, not the obduracy or unkindness of Nature."

If Australia was pointed to, he would quote from the last number of the Mining Journal of London—a paper of long-established reputation. That paper said—

> "Strong evidence is to be found in the work of white labour in other camps, and especially of late in West Australia amid natural difficulties unknown on the Rand. On these fields highly skilled labour has been evolved from raw material and costs reduced to something like 16 per cent. below those current on the Rand for similar class of ores, which suggests that economic considerations do not prevent the magnates from accepting this solution, since it is idle to pretend that the cost of living could not be made cheaper on the Rand than in Western Australia, In South Africa no attempt has been made by those who reject white labour to reorganise their system so as to utilise its superior intelligence."

Again he asked under those circumstances and conditions in South Africa, which were much more favourable naturally than in America or Australia, why it was that in South Africa, and in South Africa alone, it was impossible to work gold mines except with coloured labour? The secret of the matter was that white labour was not desired. It was not that white labour was impossible. White labour was not wanted. For that there were two reasons. One was that it required a great reorganisation of the industry, something like an industrial revolution, and men were naturally unwilling to spend time, effort, and trouble in making such a great change if they had some other solution applicable. Everyone was inclined to take the line of least resistance. But there was a second reason, far more cogent from their point of view, and infinitely more powerful. Even financiers had their moments of candour, and in some of these moments they had from the leaders of the mining industry on the Rand some very significant statements. There was the statement of Mr. Rudd, one of the Directors of the Consolidated Goldfields' Company. That leader of the industry said—

> "If we could replace the 200,000 native workers by 100,000 unskilled whites, they would simply hold the government of the country in the hollow of their hand, and, without any disparagement to the British labourer, I prefer to see the more intellectual section of the community at the helm."

A report on the whole mining industry of the Rand was prepared for the ex-Colonial Secretary the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, by the Johannesburg Chamber of Mines. A summary of that report was published in The Times, and appeared in that journal on 9th February last year. A paragraph in that summary contained the words that, as long as the present policy was continued on the Rand "they could avoid that trail of the serpent,—the formation of labour unions." Now, a very significant thing had happened in connection with that paragraph. That report had been printed verbatim in the Blue-book, but the paragraph he had read was missing! [AN HON. MEMBER on the OPPOSITION Benches: The trail of the serpent rubbed it out.] Now, either The Times correspondent must have invented that sentence out of his own head and put into it the summary he had forwarded to The Times, or else the Chamber of Mines must have found out that they had been too candid, and had published a revised version of their report and sent it to the Colonial Office. But they had further corroboration in the evidence of Mr. Hennen Jennings, who had played an important part in this question. That gentleman was one of the most distinguished American consulting mining engineers on the Rand. And it should be remembered that most of the leading consulting engineers were not Englishmen looking at this problem from the standpoint of patriots, but Americans who looked at it through the eyes of foreigners. A witness before the Labour Commission, Mr. Wybergh, was asked the question—"Can you tell the Commission what his (Mr. Jennings') opinions were, or are, on the matter?" And he answered—

"I think it would probably be better to get them from himself, but as he made no secret of his opinions, I may say that what he told me was that he did not want white labour, and that he did not believe in it—at least it came to this really, that he did not want it—he objected to it."

And there was the now famous letter of Mr. Tarbutt, a Director of the Goldfields' Company and the Chairman of the Village Main Reef Company, who wrote on 3rd July, 1902, to Mr. Creswell—

> "With reference to your trial of white labour for surface work on the mines, I was not present at the board meeting, when a letter was written stating that the board did not approve of the suggestion, and on receipt of the last mail I called another board to reconsider the matter, in view of the fact that the local board had already commenced to adopt your suggestion. I have consulted the Consolidated Goldfields' people, and one of the members of the board of the Village Main Reef has consulted Messrs. Wernher, Beit, & Co., and the feeling seems to be one of fear that if a large number of white men are employed on the Rand in the position of labourers, the same troubles will arise as are now prevalent in the Australian Colonies, i.e., that the combination of the labouring classes will become so strong as to be able to more or less dictate, not only on the question of wages, but also on political questions by the power of the votes when a representative Government is established."

MR. CUST (Southwark, Bermondsey): Has the hon. Gentleman seen the answer of Mr. Jennings'?

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: No, I have not seen it, but the hon. Member can give it when he speaks in the course of the debate. It must be remembered what strong motives these men had for not being candid; how everything must induce them to keep quiet their opinions; and yet they had these four declarations clear and distinct, to the effect that even if white labour were economically possible, they did not want it, because the white labourers would be members of trades unions and have votes. Indeed, everybody who was acquainted with the opinions of these circles was aware that what was continually being said was that they did not want the Transvaal to become another Australia; they wanted to keep the power in their own hands. It was not so much coloured labour, or cheap labour, that they desired. They needed above all labour which would be voteless and subservient. That was the secret of the whole matter. But it would be said that Lord Milner supported these men. Lord Milner also said he did not want white labour, even if it were possible. His reason for this attitude was different. It had been distinctly declared. He did not want unskilled white labour. His words were "We do not want a white proletariate in this country." His deliberate policy was that he wished the Transvaal and South Africa to remain permanently a country in which an aristocracy of whites was supported by, was dependent upon, the labour of a servile class of coloured men. Now, he submitted to the House, he submitted to the Colonial Secretary, who was a student of political science, and who was accustomed to take large views, that was a profoundly false ideal for the future of South Africa. It was always a temptation to depend upon the labour of alien serfs. Perhaps it was in the tropics unavoidable. He had no doubt that they should be told that there was the precedent of the West Indies and Natal. But that was no precedent. The West Indies were a tropical country and Natal was a sub-tropical country, whereas the Transvaal was a temperate country. Moreover, the conditions of the indentured labour were wholly different. In the Transvaal, which had a temperate climate, it would be far better if there never had been any servile black races in the country. Who could doubt that South Africa would have been a cleaner and a happier country if the Kaffirs had never been there. But the Kaffirs were there; and they must naturally take their place in the economic system; and he was not, of course, going on the assumption that the blacks could be removed. But the helot system was always an evil system, and they wished as far as they could to work away from it, and to make the Transvaal as far as possible a homogeneous white country. Lord Milner, on the other hand, finding that one race of subordinate labour had apparently proved insufficient in numbers now desired to reinforce that by another race of subordinate labour. The black being not enough, he now wished to introduce the yellow. They had no sympathy with this administrator in a hurry, who wanted to run up a jerry-built colony. They would rather see the Transvaal built up slowly as a white man's country than built up rapidly as a yellow man's country. They were at the parting of the ways. The whole future of South Africa was at stake to-day, and it was that consideration which gave this question its momentous importance. They were told that the Transvaal Labour Commission had reported that the native supply of labour was insufficient, and that white labour was impossible. They should, however, remember that the Commission was not like an English Royal Commission. It was merely the Chamber of Mines writ large. Twelve members reported; two of them were in favour of white labour; and of the remaining ten, seven had made public declarations in favour of Chinese labour before their appointment. The evidence in support of that statement would be found on page 350 of the Blue-book. Two other members were said to have acted similarly; but he had no evidence as to that. The Commission accepted without question all the evidence presented by the Chamber of Mines and rejected all the contrary evidence. Indeed it was common talk in Johannesburg immediately after the formation of the Commission, and before it had begun to take evidence that the Report would be ten against white labour, and two in favour of it; and in the circumstances he thought they might dismiss very lightly the Report of this Commission. But they could not dismiss very lightly the action of the Transvaal Government in appointing a Commission of that kind. The Transvaal Government had a parti pris in this matter. It had abandoned the seat of judge. It had come down to the bar and taken on itself the functions of counsel for the plaintiff. There had long been two Governments in the Transvaal. There was the official ostensible Government of the Crown, represented by the High Commissioner, the Lieutenant-Governor, and the Legislative Council. But there was also another Government—unofficial, intangible—a Government appointed by no warrant, and embodied in no individuals, the Government of the mine-owners. The late Colonial Secretary recognised that; for when he was in South Africa and complaint was made that the Government of the Transvaal was a Crown Colony Government, he said at a banquet—"Surely you would rather be governed by Downing Street than by Park Lane." Whereupon his audience burst into loud applause. But Downing Street had now abdicated and Park Lane was supreme, and that was why this House should don the ermine of the judge and take into its own hands the decision. There appeared to be a kind of "Alice-in-Wonderland" theory that the more white labour that was excluded the more white labour would be employed. It might be true, as the majority of the Commission had reported, that if they had Chinese labour in South Africa they would have 5,000 more white artisans employed. But if there was no Chinese labour in the Transvaal they would employ, not 5,000, but 50,000 white labourers. And from the point of view of the future of the Transvaal, they must depend not so much on the gold mines as on agriculture. Fifty thousand white labourers would form an important market for agricultural produce. The Chinese would consume rice and salt fish, which would not give any encouragement to the agricultural industry. It was true that they were to be supplied with gods from Birmingham, and with coffins in which their bones were to be transported to their fatherland, but those things were not likely to encourage the economic development of the Transvaal. This was as clear an issue as had ever arisen between capital and labour—between money and men. The ex-Colonial Secretary, speaking at Leeds on alien immigration into this country, said—

> "We are not going to allow the foreign workman, unless he be of a very desirable description, to take the bread out of the mouth of the British working man."

Were they going to adopt that rule in the Transvaal? Did the right hon. Gentleman pretend that a Chinaman was of such a very desirable description, or did he maintain that the employment of Chinese unskilled labour would not exclude the British workman? Evidence after evidence, authority after authority, showed they could employ unskilled white labour if only they adopted the proper machinery and appliances, and the reason why it was excluded was because it was not wanted. And this was to be the outcome of the great war. He thought that it was Guizot who said of the French Republic of 1848 that it began with Plato and ended with the gendarme. The South African War began with great ideals. They were told that it was fought in the interests of freedom, that here we should have a great new colony to be the home of another British nation. And how does it all end? In 300,000 Chinese serfs. In this country there was a feeling of bitter disappointment—an undercurrent of deep resentment—in this matter, which, when it came to the surface, would sweep away many of those who now supported this proposal. Was the voice of the Colonies not to be heard in this matter? The Colonies helped to conquer the Transvaal, and they had expressed their views clearly and emphatically. The Cape was unanimously against Chinese labour, and there was a deep feeling against it in Australia and New Zealand. They were told during that war that England should consider the opinion of the Colonies. Now they were told that the Colonies had nothing to do with this matter.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. LYTTELTON, Warwick and Leamington): I said directly the contrary.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL said that whatever the right hon. Gentleman's words might have been, what were his acts?

The advice of the Colonies was being ignored and disregarded. Why this difference between now and the time of the war? It was because the views of the Colonies were in agreement with the views of the Government then, and they were opposed to them now. This Amendment had been drawn with extreme moderation. It did not ask this House to veto the Ordinance. He thought they might have been justified in doing that. They had not even asked the House to refer the matter to the whole of South Africa. They merely asked that the assent of the people of the Transvaal themselves should be formally ascertained, either through a popularly elected Parliament which they should prefer, or, failing that, through a referendum. The right hon. Gentleman said he was prepared to treat the Transvaal as a self-governing colony. That was precisely what they asked. What course would be adopted by a self-governing colony on a question of this magnitude, in Australia, for instance, or in New Zealand? There would be either a general election or a referendum, and that was what they now asked. They were told that the delay would be too long, but it would only take a few weeks to frame a register on the basis of the franchise in Cape Colony, perhaps, and to take a vote. To decide this important question, which was pregnant with so much good or evil for the future, was it too much that they should ask for a delay of a few weeks? But they were told that the Government knew that the majority in the Transvaal were favourable to the proposal, and that therefore it was not necessary to take a referendum. But if the Government knew that the majority was in favour of Chinese labour, why do they fear a referendum? Why did the mine-owners oppose it? They, on the contrary, felt convinced that the majority in the Transvaal was not in favour of this proposal. They knew that the majority was against it a year ago. The ex-Colonial Secretary said in that House in March—

> "That the vast majority of the people of South Africa were opposed to Asiatic labour."

In January last Lord Milner said that—

> "A year ago Sir George Farrar's proposal would have found very few supporters in the country."

Now they were asked to believe that in the brief period which had elapsed such an extraordinary turnover had occurred in the Transvaal. That was an exceedingly difficult thing to prove.

The Government were relying on three things: the Legislative Council, public meetings, and the petition. The Legislative Council had declared in favour of Chinese labour. But it was not representative. Every one of its members had been nominated by Lord Milner. The late Colonial Secretary said that when a question was put to a Council so appointed they should weigh the votes as well as count them; and he added that if they found that the representatives of labour were opposed to any proposal he should regard it as an important factor. What was the position with regard to this Council? Of the twenty-six members who voted thirteen were official, and of the other thirteen four were directly or indirectly concerned with the financial houses. Of the other nine, four belonged to the class known locally as "tame Boers." The representative Boers had not consented to serve on the Council, and the Government secured these gentlemen who it was well-known were very open to influence and advice. He did not think the opinion of the four Boers was really representative of the Boer population because it was well-known that they were susceptible to advice. Of the thirteen non-official members four were directly connected with this matter, four were these Boers, and of the five that remained one voted for the Ordinance and the remainder voted against it. There was only one labour member in the Council, and the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Colonial Secretary had said he would attach the greatest importance to the opinion of labour members. This labour member voted against the Ordinance. There could be no doubt but that very great pressure had been brought to bear on the people of the Transvaal in this matter. He would mention only one case in illustration. Three men had stood out as the opponents of Chinese labour, each in the front rank of his several calling. Mr. Wybergh in the Government—the Commissioner of Mines; Mr. Monypenny in the press—the editor of the Johannesburg Star; Mr. Creswell at the mines—the General Manager of the Village Main Reef. What had happened to those three men? Mr. Wybergh was obliged to resign his appointment in the Government, Mr. Monypenny his editorship of the Johannesburg Star, and Mr. Creswell his position of mine manager. If that was what happened to those in high places what might have happened to those in obscure positions. With regard to public meetings, on only two occasions was the number of votes in favour of the importation of Chinese labour given in the reports of the fourteen meetings mentioned in the Blue-book. But in any case open voting by a show of hands was no test of the opinion of the people; had the voting been by secret ballot the result would have been very different. As to the petition, no authoritative examination had been made into the signatures, half of which, for all they knew, might have been duplicates or fictitious, Great pressure had been exerted and all opposition had been forced underground. But a great many resolutions had been passed against the importation of Chinese labour, and only yesterday we had presented the letter sent by the leaders of the Boer people. So long as the Constitution of the Transvaal was suspended it was this House, and not the nominated Council in Pretoria, that was the true guardian of the interests of the people of the Transvaal. This House could not divest itself of that function unless it deputed the matter to a free vote of the people of that country.

In conclusion, he thanked the House for its kind indulgence in having listened for so long, and so patiently to one who was young, not only in Membership of this House, but also in years. He had spoken, he hoped, without exaggeration. He had spoken, he was sure, without Party feeling. To sum up what he had said: They asserted that these thousands of Chinese, socially, could not fail to be a centre of demoralisation in the places in which they lived. They asserted that the conditions under which they would be employed were conditions almost of slavery. Politically, the proposal, by maintaining the Boers in a majority would lead to the postponement of self-government in the Transvaal, and it would hinder, if not prevent, the Federation of South Africa. Although there was a shortage of labour, there was no crisis in the Transvaal due to the low production of the mines, since the production of gold was as high now as it was in 1898, and in only one year had the yield ever been higher than it was now. Even if Kaffir labour could not be obtained, white labour could be economically employed in getting the gold. The reason why white labour was not employed was not because it could not be used economically but because it was not desired. He did not ask the House itself to settle this question, but to refer it to the judgment of the people of the Transvaal. That was their case, and he submitted it was an overwhelming case. This House had to arrive at a grave judgment; it had to look to the future, to build up the greatness, of a new British colony. It had to decide whether it would lightly permit a new community of serfs to be established under its flag. It had to decide whether the waste-places of the earth under its control should be peopled by Mongolians or should be the homes of the white peoples. Those were large issues. They touched the very roots of Imperial policy. He prayed that the House might be guided by wisdom in its decision.

*MAJOR SEELY (Isle of Wight), in rising to second the Amendment, asked the House to believe that he fully realised the gravity of the question to be discussed, and he asked the House to reflect what the consequences might be if it refused to sanction the Amendment. He also craved indulgence, because he himself had some special reason to take an interest in this matter. He took up the question and protested against the importation of Chinese indentured labour long before he dreamed that any hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House would make it their cause. Nor could he believe even now they had made this cause their own. He was certain the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary had not, and he believed before the debate terminated that the truth would prevail, and that the House would arrive at a judgment which would avoid the disaster which would follow hasty action in this matter. Many Members might have deeper knowledge of the methods of the mines and all connected with them than he, but no hon. Member could have a deeper political interest in the welfare of South Africa. The question presented itself to his mind as one upon which they should try to proceed as far as possible by way of agreement. The able speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment had stated very accurately some reasons for believing that it was possible to use white labour in South Africa, but he would approach the matter from another point of view and see how far both sides could agree. Every single Member of the House was agreed that this proposal to import Chinese labour was in itself an evil.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): No.

*MAJOR SEELY: The hon. Member for Gravesend had said it was not an evil. Even he would agree that it was highly undesirable, so that every Member with one exception would agree that it was an evil and all would agree that it was highly undesirable. It might be difficult to appeal to any living man for an impartial opinion upon this question, he would therefore appeal to one who was dead, to the greatest thinking mind of this age, Herbert Spencer! Herbert Spencer was asked his opinion as to the importation of Chinese labour into America, and he said—

> "I am opposed to it, because if it occurs one of two things must happen, either the Chinese must mix with the nation, in which case you get a bad hybrid, and, if on the other hand they do not mix, they must occupy a position of slavery."

While the Chinese were as much justified in their repugnance to us as we in our repugnance to them, the fact remained, and this could not be disputed, that so great was the repugnance of all Anglo-Saxon peoples to the admixture of Chinese in the population that in no single case had Chinese been imported into any country without great efforts being subsequently made to get rid of the influx of Chinese. He was speaking of Anglo-Saxon people resident in Anglo-Saxon communities for white people, but the case was wholly different in the tropics, where a small white aristocracy dominated a necessarily subject race. It was a strange thing that the House should now be asked, after somewhat scant consideration, to import into a country, which we had lately acquired not too easily, the very thing that every Anglo-Saxon community was doing its utmost to eject and exclude. Moreover, it had always been opposed in the country to which the Amendment referred. The question of the shortage of labour had been the subject of various inquiries. The Cape Labour Commission of 1893 came to the conclusion that there was not a sufficiency of Kaffir labour, but their Report concluded with the words—adding that there was quite enough race complication already. In 1898 the Chamber of Mines, in their Annual Report on the Labour Supply, after stating that there was a shortage of labour, said that proposals had been made for an importation of Asiatic labour, but they did not recommend the adoption of that course. So that the Chamber of Mines at the time saw the grave dangers which underlay the importation of Asiatics. He did not desire to dwell on the social evils which must flow from Chinese labour. Herbert Spencer, in a letter which recently appeared in The Times, after stating his objections to Chinese labour, declared that if there was any large importation of Chinese labour immense social difficulty, and ultimately great social disorganisation, would arise.

The House should not be misled by suggestions for bringing wives and families with these Chinese. Without imputing evil motives to anyone, he unhesitatingly stated that those responsible for the importation of Chinese labour would demur to the suggestion that they contemplated bringing wives and children for 40 per cent. of the number of labourers they hoped to obtain. If the mine-owners induced this country ultimately to agree to the importation of 150,000 indentured labourers it was not at all likely that they would also take upon themselves the burden of supporting wives, with an average of three children apiece, for 40 per cent. of the number. That would mean that something like 250,000 women and children would be herded round about the Witwatersrand mines, and from what he had heard from gentlemen thoroughly conversant with the question, he thought the suggestion was primâ facie absurd. Chinamen had never taken their wives and families into distant lands in the past, even when there were no restrictions. During the years 1861–81 there were practically no restrictions on the entry of Chinamen into Australia and New Zealand; large numbers went there, and some 30,000 were still left, but he had never heard that they took their wives and families or that they were desirable citizens. He had read Blue-book after Blue-book on the subject, and all colonial statesmen of experience concurred in the view that the importation of Chinamen, whether indentured or otherwise, was disastrous to a country. That being so, was it likely that to this new country, where the cost of living was infinitely dearer than in other countries, the Chinamen would take their wives and families? Before believing that anything so inherently improbable was likely to take place, the House should be placed in possession of incontrovertible proof that arrangements had been made in writing by those who proposed the importation of these men for the bringing of the wives and children. But even if such arrangements were made, what about the remaining 60 per cent.? It was difficult to speak on the subject in the House of Commons, for he deprecated the raking up of terrible stories of the results of Chinese immigration. He did not believe that those stories were generally founded on facts, but he did hold that, whereas the Chinese might be a great nation, and no man would wish to say anything against a people who had so many great qualities, the class of persons who emigrated under the conditions foreshadowed in this Ordinance, were not a desirable class, and that they tended to be a criminal and a debasing people.

But admitting the evil, was it a necessary evil? The hon. Member for the Cleveland Division had made out an extraordinarily good case against immediately assuming that the alternative of white labour was impossible. He did not say that white labour was possible, but it had not yet been shown to be impossible. A view which prevailed with many hon. Members was that if more Chinamen were imported more white labour would be used. We wanted to arrive, as far as possible, at a white South Africa. It was agreed that the more white people there were the better it would be. It must also be agreed that if the importation of Chinamen was not permitted, the proportion of white men to coloured would be greater than if the importation was allowed. Before the war about 9,5000 natives and 9,500 whites were employed in the Witwatersrand mines, while in the last month for which figures were available, the numbers employed were 68,000 and 12,700 respectively. Therefore, when there was not so much shortage of labour, the proportion of whites to natives was one in ten, while at present the proportion was nearly one in five. Although it might be more profitable to have more black men in proportion to the white, actually they could not get them but more white were employed in proportion. Let them suppose if they imported these Chinamen they might employ more white men altogether, although he did not admit this. The point was that if the House refused to sanction this Ordinance, the proportion of white men would be greater than if they allowed this Ordinance to come into force. The hon. Member opposite read a startling passage from Lord Milner's reply to a deputation. After having read that in the Blue-book he could not conceive how His Majesty's Government could for one moment dream of sanctioning an Ordinance which was known to be contrary to the wishes of the overwhelming proportion of those who were citizens under the British flag in those colonies. Lord Milner admitted that the progress of South Africa after the war had been amazingly rapid, and they were now producing more gold than in 1895 and 1896. The hon. Member opposite had not, however, brought out the more startling fact that at the moment Lord Milner made that statement he was speaking only one year after the most devastating war which this country had experienced for a good many years. The rapid recuperation of the mining industry in South Africa, in the face of immense difficulties, had been marvellous, and those who managed the mines were deserving of the greatest credit for the way they had surmounted those difficulties. When he went to Johannesburg the line was blown up both in front and behind the train in which he travelled, and he wished to emphasise that it was less than two years since they sustained a crushing defeat not far from Johannesburg. Within less than two years the mines were actually producing between 80 and 90 per cent. of the greatest production they ever produced before. This proposal to introduce Chinese labour was like arguing that the man who stole a loaf of bread because he was hungry could no longer be sent to gaol because he pleaded urgent necessity to eat. In this case the man said, "I have had some but I am still hungry and want more." Take another example. Suppose a man found that he did not walk quite as fast as he used to before an accident and he contended that he was entitled to steal his neighbour's horse and cart in consequence. The argument was precisely similar to this proposal of the Government, and the bottom was, in fact, knocked out of the whole case by the statement of Lord Milner, who had admitted that the country was not on the verge of ruin. His hon. friend would no doubt tell them that South Africa was in a dangerous and difficult position, but there were two things to be done. One was to adopt an evil course, and the other to forswear the evil and reduce the expenditure. Seeing how great the interests involved were he thought it would be a wiser course to demand that the expenditure should be reduced rather than do an admittedly evil thing in order to increase the revenue.

He now came to the question, Who was to decide this matter? It was obvious that it could not be the people of the Transvaal, because the Government had not yet decided to give them self-government. To say that the Transvaal had decided the matter when only three meetings, two or three newspapers, and Lord Milner, who had changed his mind upon the question, had declared in favour of Chinese labour, was only trifling with the matter. Who was to decide? His right hon. friend might point out that it would have been competent for him to sanction this Ordinance without reference to the House, but the inherent power rested here, and here alone. This House had the power to turn out the Ministers and put in those who would do their will in this and other matters. The power rested in the House as well as the responsibility. What facilities had been given to hon. Members to really arrive at the truth in this matter? This was the strongest part of their case. How long had hon. Members been able to read the bulky book of evidence? He believed it was only possible to obtain it on Saturday morning last. The evidence had a startling bearing upon the whole question, because it showed that those who were in favour of another solution rather than the Chinese solution, were undoubtedly treated as hostile witnesses. That was a most extraordinary state of affairs. If they turned to the evidence of the Government Commissioner of Mines, who was the most important witness, they would find that from start to finish there were perpetual recriminations. It certainly was not the sort of Commission they were accustomed to have in this country. In Question 13976 one of the members of the Commission asked a witness if he left his employer because he was a better politician than an engineer. Was that the sort of question which ought to be put by a member of an impartial Commission? Owing to the excited state of political feeling, there could be no doubt that at the time this Commission sat, those witnesses who were opposed to the avowed desires of the mining interest were treated as hostile witnesses, and it was not a fair Commission in the sense in which they understood it. But there was another point. What was the Commission inquiring into? What evidence had the House to decide this momentous question upon? That Commission was only to inquire how far it was possible to obtain an adequate supply of labour from Central and Southern Africa. The question of Chinese labour was expressly ruled out, and there had been no inquiry into the advisability of employing Chinese labour in South Africa. It was a travesty of justice to ask the House to decide a question of this kind when there had been no inquiry into the question they were discussing. What was the answer of the right hon. Gentleman in the matter? There was no answer except that they were being hustled. He did not believe the House of Commons meant to be hustled in the matter. There had been no inquiry whatever into the desirability of Chinese labour and the possibility of obtaining white labour. They might rightly claim before they undertook so momentous a step, so absolutely contrary to every precedent—the imposition of this kind of labour on a country which was shortly to receive self-government—that there should be some inquiry. There ought to have been a great deal more knowledge on the subject presented to Parliament. He knew that a great many hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House were as bitterly opposed to this proposal as he was himself. Let them suppose that the forces against them were sufficiently strong to allow the Ordinance to be sanctioned. He understood from his right hon. friend that this was the moment when this matter was to be decided. If the Ordinance was sanctioned in the House by the rejection of the Amendment, his right hon. friend would communicate to South Africa the adhesion of the Government to it, and the importation of Chinese labour would then forthwith begin. If that was so, it was one of the most important moments that this House could well conceive of, involving as it did the welfare of the whole colony.

What was going to be the position of affairs? Whom were they going to have on their side in South Africa and whom against them? Undoubtedly this country, or rather this Government, would have on its side the mining interest acting entirely from their own point of view in the interests of their share-holders, whose interests alone they had to consider, and rightly so; and they would have on their side a certain number of Englishmen in the Transvaal. He did not suppose that the Colonial Secretary suggested that the whole of the 7,000 out of the 12,000 white men employed on the mines were necessarily in favour of it. When employers handed round a petition it was wise to sign it. He absolutely assented to the telegram which was read out that no undue influence was used to obtain signatures, but it must be apparent that if employers wished a thing, and said they wished it, it was wiser for the workmen to accept it. The Government would have on their side a proportion of the 7,000. Whom were they going to have against them? They were going to have against them all the other Englishmen. They were going to have gainst them the whole of the Dutch population. [An HON. MEMBER: No.] He heard an hon. Member say "No." He presumed his meaning was that, whereas the Boer leaders, Botha and Delarey, had issued a pronunciamento that the Dutch population was opposed to this that they did not mean what they said, and that their people would not follow them? The House had been twice taken in by that, and bitterly had this country cause to repent of her folly in not believing that the Dutch people stuck by those who had led them in peace and war. They had better not make the same mistake again. The Government, in this matter, would have practically the whole of Cape Colony against them. He might say that he received a telegram last night which he believed to be true—he would be corrected if he was wrong—saying that every one of the members recently elected to the Cape Colony Legislature had expressed themselves strongly opposed to the introduction of Chinese labour. Surely it was madness, in the face of this position, to go through with the thing with this indecent haste, because after all what was the idea with which we went through the war from which we had just emerged. He remembered reading an eloquent speech by the hon. Member for West Birmingham, which was delivered to Delarey's men in presence of Delarey, during the tour of the right hon. Gentleman in South Africa. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had often seen the graves of British soldiers who fell in the war, and that he had often seen side by side those of Boers who fell in the same struggle, and he concluded by saying —"They sleep together in peace. Let us who live, live also in peace." Fine words finely spoken. Now we come to the test of what we were going to do. These men with whom the right hon. Gentleman pleaded for peace have unanimously protested that this proposal is a mistake, and that it would be a national disaster of first magnitude. Was that likely to procure peace? He could not refrain from quoting a beautiful verse which was made on that very speech—

"They sleep possessed of her they sought,
Briton and Boer side by side,
They both alike for freedom fought, for freedom died.
Here let us bury outworn hate
For ever neath the tear-stained sod,
And build a new and better State for man and God."

Was that what they were going to do? He knew this House did not like sentimentality, but he claimed that this was no mere empty appeal. The hearts of the people at home had been bitterly stirred. There was hardly a family that had not suffered, but they thought that we fought for great ideals, but so surely as we imported 150,000 slaves into South Africa, so surely would we shatter these ideals. He did not believe this House would consent to it. Two voices were calling to them now. One called to them from every self-governing colony that had had any experience of the evil of which he told the Government. A vast majority of the people of South Africa, and he believed an overwhelming majority of the people of this country asked them not to be in a hurry, not to be in indecent haste, when they were without proper knowledge about to assent to this proposal. On the other hand, we had the cry of self-interest that we might be a little richer, the cry that the £12,500,000 of gold now being dug might be increased to £16,000,000 as before. Surely this House would not consent to it. He did not think the force this Government could bring to bear on hon. Members would make them consent. He had advanced reasons for saying that they should weigh this proposal long and carefully. They were bound, not only by every tradition of this House, by every precedent, but in honour to many persons whose wishes in this matter were going to be flouted, to do this. When we made peace with the Boers, we pledged ourselves that we would not give votes to the natives until they had self-government. He asked hon. Members whether the importation of great numbers of Chinamen and the possibilities that entailed was not a graver step than the giving of votes to the natives. He thought so, and yet they were giving no chance to those people of expressing their views in any constitutional manner whatever. Our honour was bound up in this proposal. We had bound ourselves that the Colonies should have a say in the settlement of this matter He had spoken to many representatives of the Colonies on the matter, and he could assure the House that every one felt bitterly upon it. We were bound to consider the wishes of our self-governing colonies; we were bound to consider the Dutch with whom we had made peace; and we were bound in honour to consider the bitter cry of the people of this country who had suffered. It was only a little more than four and a half years ago that it seemed very likely that South Africa would be, as had been prophesied, the grave of England's greatness. Let this House see to it to-day that it was not the grave of England's honour.

Amendment proposed—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words, 'And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that it is highly inexpedient that sanction should be given to any ordinance permitting the introduction of indentured Chinese labourers into the Transvaal Colony until the approval of the colonists has been formally ascertained.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR. LYTTELTON: My hon. and gallant friend who has just sat down has advanced a great number of highly questionable propositions, and he has inferred with the courage of youth, from the silence in which they have been received, that hon. Gentlemen upon this side admit them to be true. He has taken, I think, as among the admissions made by us on this side of the House that we have acted upon insufficient evidence. I traverse that absolutely.

*MAJOR SEELY: I never said so.

*MR. LYTTELTON: He has taken it that it is admitted upon this side that it is in itself an evil to bring Chinese into a country whose necessities of labour demand that the existing labour should be supplemented. I must not be taken as admitting that. I admit, however, that it is an unfortunate circumstance when a country is unable to provide labour for itself. It is also, I think, more than unfortunate, but still an undoubted fact, that white men in Africa will not do the work which black men do. So far only do I make any admission to my hon. and gallant friend. To the complaint that the House has been rushed in this matter a sufficient answer is furnished by the speech of the mover of this Amendment. No one who heard that speech—though, of course, I do not agree with it and I think it did me some injustice—could for a moment doubt that a man of industry and a man of ability, such as my hon. friend is, had abundant time for mastering not only the principles but the details of this matter. My hon. and gallant friend said he understood from me that I was going to sanction the removal of the suspensory clause inserted by my request, at the instance of the Leader of the Opposition, in order to give Parliament time, not to discuss every line of the Ordinance—that would be a wholly absurd proceeding for the Imperial Parliament—but in order to raise before the people of this country in the fullest way the general question whether the introduction of Asiatic labour into the Transvaal is right or wrong. Let me say at the beginning that the hon. mover of this Amendment did me an injustice when he said I was amenable in this matter. Does the Blue-book show it? The Blue-book shows that I endeavoured to take every possible precaution to ensure that the fullest deliberation should be given to the discussion of this matter, and the Government only approved of the principle of this measure with the distinct conviction and belief that the labour which would be introduced would not be a substitute for, but would be supplementary to, the labour now employed. They acted with the conviction that this step would increase and not diminish white employment. Further they are absolutely convinced that the measure is one of extraordinary urgency, and that the vital economic necessities of the Transvaal demand it. [OPPOSITION cries of "Why?"] I will come to that presently. I put last, but I am certain that no one in this House who knows me will suppose that I think it last in importance, the fact that the Government consider that these ends may be achieved without any ethical or moral stain either upon the Chinese who may be introduced or upon others.

Before I endeavour to make good these arguments may I make a few general observations to the House which I most earnestly commend to both sides of the House for their serious consideration? Do not approach this subject in the air. Look steadily at the actual facts of the situation. Just consider what the economic situation of the Transvaal is. When the Transvaal was annexed by this country, when Lord Milner took the government over, he did not fashion the economic structure of the country, he took it over ready-formed. And what was it that he took over ready-formed? He took over a very abnormal economic condition, a vast, organised, and wealthy industry imposed upon an almost rustic community. Lord Milner did not frame that industry; His Majesty's Government did not frame it; it was framed by the great ability of those who instituted it—erected in the course of only twelve or fourteen years. Most States pass through successive stages. They are pastoral, then rural, then cities grow up to minister to their needs, and, finally, you have an industrial community, industries generally being the latest growth in a State. But in the Transvaal there has been no such process. Johannesburg, with its tall steel chimneys and great white spoil banks, rises almost straight out of the veld. It is not a mining camp, as many great mining industries have been. The wealth which is being worked there is known to exist just as well as is the coal in South Wales and even better than on the diamond fields at Kimberley. The rate of output of this extraordinary place was £18,000,000 per annum before the war.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): £20,000,000.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I prefer to keep within the mark. That output practically represented the whole wealth, the whole taxable capacity of the State. It is thus, that, after the annexation, the rulers of that country are confronted not with the problems of a small State, but with all the problems of an advanced industrial community. From those facts there follow, as it seems to me, two things—first, that it was necessary to form and equip a fully civilised and modern Government; next, that it was necessary, having formed that Government, by means of the resources of the mines to endeavour to develop the residue of the country so as to bring the body into proportion with the head. It was a peril, and it is a peril, that you should have a State with a gigantic and wealthy centre and with the other portions undeveloped. It was the policy of the Government, by making roads and railways, by land settlement, by irrigation, to bring up this State into line with Johannesburg, its head. Men are better than minerals.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): What we want is free men.

*MR. LYTTELTON: If you use the resources of this gigantic industry for the purpose of developing the whole country, surely you are doing a right, politic, and statesmanlike thing for the community. A strong rural community, well backed, is that without which no State is really secure. Lastly, we have spent £250,000,000 and made great sacrifices for that country. We have—I think I was one of the first in this country publicly to advocate it—repatriated the Boers; we have reconstructed their farms and stocked them to the best of our ability. We wish the Boers well, but we also wish well to our own people. We do not wish—it would be against human nature—that when we have made this gigantic effort it should be for the benefit of the Boers alone, and that we should leave our own people uncared for and in a minority. May I summarise what I have been endeavouring to say? I have said that the economic situation when this country annexed the Transvaal necessitated the institution of a well-organised and a well-equipped Government, and an attempt by that Government to develop the country by means of the wealth of the mines, so as to make it an organic and proportioned whole, and thus attract the Briton to come in with the Boer and possess the land. I submit to the House, whether they agree with it or not—and I should rather judge from the way they have met it that they do agree with it—I submit that that policy was a wise one. It is, at any rate, a coherent and far-seeing policy. But look at what it has involved. It has involved a substantial cost and we have laid a debt—and this House has assented to it—for the purpose of developing this country in the manner which I have described we have laid a debt on the country of £35,000,000

I have said the country would be well able to meet these charges. The gold in the land is to the eye of science actually visible. The machinery is equipped to get it, but the labour only is lacking for the purpose. I ought to read one or two extracts only. Sir Arthur Lawley, on 30th October, said—

> "The financial position here to-day is most serious. I am of opinion personally that the only thing which stands between us and a general crisis is the sanguine hope of the early introduction of Asiatic labour."

On 29th September Lord Milner said—

> "The immediate prospect is very bad. There is complete stagnation of commerce and industry owing to the labour difficulty, and it affects almost every branch of revenue, especially the railways."

He adds—

> "There are no signs of an adequate amount of labour being obtained from the existing source of supply, and the consequent depression in every kind of business is increasing daily. The revenue is falling off, many people are out of work, and if the situation does not soon change a considerable exodus of the white population is inevitable. On the other hand, there is nothing wrong with the mines except insufficiency of labour. They are equipped for the production of at least 60 per cent. above the present, and plenty of capital for further development is assured if only the labour difficulty is overcome."

The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment referred to 300,000 Chinese being required.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: That is in the Report.

*MR. LYTTELTON: The Report said that that number of labourers might be required in the future, but there is no authority for saying that 300,000 Chinese would be necessary. Lord Milner went on—

> "No one, indeed, any longer supposes that the experiment of Asiatic labour, even if successful, can do more than supplement the local supply or justify any relaxation in the immense effort that is being made to develop the latter . . . But in the opinion of the best judges we may hope gradually to obtain an amount of labour from Asia which will substitute steady and substantial progress for the present complete stagnation."

I ought, perhaps, to give the House an independent authority on this matter. Mr. Birchenough, in his report on the financial condition of the country to the Board of Trade, having dealt in the fairest way with the question of Asiatic labour. He said—

> "The real danger of the situation lies in the prolongation of the present financial strain. It is really a race against time, and that is why experiments, however well-meaning, which take years to show their results are impracticable. The trouble of the problem is the difficulty of obtaining labour. There is no dispute as to the wealth which lies in the Transvaal, nor is it denied that the essential conditions which affect the gold mines are more favourable than before the war, with the single exception of the labour supply. But, as I have indicated, the whole of the industrial and commercial interests of the Transvaal are too important for it to be allowed to stand indefinitely in the way."

Now, I say that the credit of the new States, on which the prosperity of South Africa as a whole depends, is very vitally at stake in this matter. The House knows from the Blue-books that the deficit anticipated as the result of the shortage of the present financial year is no less than £350,000. This House has, without a division, imposed the obligations to which I referred at the beginning of my speech, which must be defrayed by the mines—the obligations, that is, of discharging the cost and expense of this newly equipped and expensive Government and the cost and expense of the equipment and development of the country, including the interest on the £35,000,000 loan. I am not simply speaking now of the moral question. Can you, as a matter of economic prudence and policy, having laid this great burden on a community, deny them, if they put proper restrictions and precautions upon it, the opportunity to discharge the obligations which you have so laid upon them? Now, Sir, you may say, and I fully accept the rightness and relevancy of the challenge—you may say: "Granted in your favour that you have established a political and economic case for the introduction of Chinese labour, yet across your path in proposing that policy lie obstacles, social, industrial, and moral, which no considerations of economics or policy can remove." That is the issue.

I take first the political issue. The mover of the Amendment said that Lord Milner had been always in favour of Chinese labour. He is entirely inaccurate as to that. Lord Milner was not in favour of it at the beginning of 1903. The hon. Member also said that the reason why the proposal had been made was that I was more amenable than my predecessor. That is also inaccurate. My predecessor's views on this matter were stated as long ago as March of last year, when he said—

> "I ventured, when I was in South Africa, to promise, at all events on behalf of my own Government—and I believe I can safely do so on behalf of the whole House of Commons—that although technically they"—

> "were Crown colonies, and as such subject in the last resort to any ultimatum that may be propounded from Downing-street, the Government would treat them in all matters in which Imperial interests are not directly considered as if they were self-governing colonies."

And the hon. Gentleman, I am sure unintentionally, endeavoured to convey to the House that my predecessor's mind was made up on this subject. He is quite inaccurate again. On 27th July last, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Monmouth, my right hon. friend said—that is, to Asiatic labour—

> "the right hon. Gentleman may rest perfectly satisfied that I shall not assent to it, and I shall certainly not be a party to imposing it on a hostile majority. But the right hon. Gentleman asks me what the future is likely to be. I think it is very likely that the opinion which is now hostile may not always be hostile, and I have received information—I do not know exactly what importance to attach to it at the present moment—that amongst the Boer farmers the pressure for labour has become very acute.'

I only want to show that my predecessor laid down the principle which the Government have adopted on this question—namely, that of treating these colonies, as far as possible, as if they were self-governing, and I have read that extract to show that my right hon. friend was aware in July that opinion was coming round on the question.

Now let me just enumerate the precautions we have taken before we venture to ask the House here to say that we have obtained a satisfactory pronouncement of opinion from the Transvaal. Before the Transvaal Government moved in the matter at all, a private member was directed to bring forward by way of resolution the question, aye or no, whether Asiatic labour should be introduced. On that resolution every official member had entire freedom to vote according to his own convictions. That liberty, which I think everybody here, even the Member for Northampton agrees was rightly accorded to them, was exercised. The result of the debate on the resolution brought forward by a private member was approved by a vote of twenty-two to four. Of the unofficial members nine to four voted in favour of the proposal. These unofficial members were collected from various parts of the Transvaal. They were representative men. Of the majority there were four Boers, two were mining men, two were leading men in business. One was a British farmer who had been living there for many years. That was the composition of the majority of the unofficial members. The thirteen official members of the Assembly all voted in favour of the resolution. [Cheers.] I suppose by that cheer it is meant to imply that they did not act honestly or according to their convictions. I absolutely repudiate that. Yes, Sir, and I have some right to repudiate it, because I have seen many of these gentlemen. Some of them belong to the party which I now confront. They belong many of them to a party which has opposed what are called "capitalists," and I should like any one here who has ventured to indulge in that sneer at the expense of absent men to get up in his place and say one single word in the face of South Africa and his own friends there, derogatory to Sir Richard Solomon, to Sir Godfrey Lagden, to Mr. Duncan, and to many others who have worked themselves to the bone on behalf of the State. Is this a new opinion in South Africa?

Sir JOHN GORST (Cambridge Univerisity): Yes.

*Mr. LYTTELTON: Yes, the Member for Cambridge University says. He is generally too well informed. At the beginning of 1903, only a year ago, the intercolonial conference, called the Bloemfontein Conference, assembled, containing representatives of every State in South Africa. So far as Cape Colony was concerned—the only State of South Africa which has since declared itself hostile to the principle—Sir Gordon Sprigg, Mr. Molteno, and another member of the Bond whose name for the moment I forget, were chosen by their Parliament as representatives of the State on whose behalf they appeared. Every single State, including Cape Colony, passed a resolution with a unanimous voice. That resolution was that native labour was insufficient south of the Zambesi to carry out the labour requirments of South Africa, and recommended that, subject to proper restrictions, Asiatic labour should be introduced, pronouncing at the same time that Asiatic labour should be of a temporary and not of a permanent character. That is the situation affirmed again in 1903, as my hon. and gallant friend said, affirmed so far as Cape Colony is concerned as far back as 1876, showing it was no new thing. It was no paradox, so far as the Cape was concerned, that this Commission was going to prove. In the opinion of Rhodesia, Natal, the Transvaal, Orange River Colony, and Cape Colony; all those five States, represented by five or six members for each, voted unanimously affirming the proposition. It seems ingenuous on the part of my hon. and gallant friend, but one expects ingenuousness from him, to suppose that the judgment of Cape Colony which affirmed the resolution has been wholly unaffected by the circumstances of the general election, which was proceeding, when it next came to declare itself. To those who are experienced in this House I will not labour that matter. The inference is obvious.

I pass from that to the Boer letter of three or four days ago on which my hon. friend seems to place so much reliance. I ask the House for a moment to follow the circumstances under which that letter was written. On 28th December, this debate on the resolution, aye or no, should Chinese labour be introduced, was before the Legislative Council. After the passage of the resolution by a majority of twenty-two to four, six weeks, or nearly six weeks, elapsed before the publication of the Boer letter. During that time and during the occurrence of the debate in the Transvaal Assembly every possible opportunity was given for the collection of Boer opinion in the matter, and Mr. Hull, who was one of the four who opposed the introduction of Chinese labour, ventured to quote in that Assembly that General Botha was against the introduction of Chinese labour, and that he spoke representatively on behalf of the Boers. That was what Mr. Hull said at that very debate. How did General Botha receive it? He repudiated Mr. Hull's authority to make any such statement.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): Or any statement at all.

*MR. LYTTELTON: My hon. friend is quite right. I will not push this too far. He repudiated Mr. Hull's authority to make any statement on his behalf. The point is not that which the hon. Member for Camberwell thought I had in my mind. All I seek to establish by that fact is that at that time General Botha knew perfectly well that there were people debating this question; are the Boers or not in favour of this Chinese labour? He would not allow anybody to pledge their word on his behalf.

*MAJOR SEELY: Let him speak for himself.

*MR. LYTTELTON: My hon. and gallant friend says "Let him speak for himself." Yes, but when would have been the proper time to have spoken? Why, then, Sir. And is my hon. and gallant friend so innocent as to suppose that if it had been true that General Botha had the right to speak for the Boer population, and if he would not have been repudiated had he done so then, that he would not then and there have contradicted him. General Botha, knowing that statements were being made on 28th December or thereabouts that the Boers were against this measure, would not allow any statement to be made on his or their behalf at all. He lies by for six weeks, and then, when the whole thing is settled; when the resolution has been passed, the first reading, the second reading, and then the third reading; when no less than six weeks had passed, in which if it had been the fact that he represented the Boers in this matter, and that they were opposed to it, he would have had abundant opportunity of making statements to that effect; then he makes this protest.

Having had many opportunities of studying a good many of the Boers' characteristics at first hand, I say that they would be the first to despise you if you were taken in by a device so palpable. The mover of this Amendment would not find me amenable to that kind of manœuvre. I mean the manœuvre of suppressing your opinions and those whom you say you represent when the matter is before the proper and constitutional authority and then, when the final stage of the Ordinance has been passed, writing a letter contrary to all the facts which had reached me.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: On 6th January in a Dutch paper is an interview with General Botha, in which he expressed his opinion as being strongly anti-Chinese. That is in your own Papers presented to-day.

*MR. LYTTELTON: At an interview. That interview was not made public for some time afterwards, and no communication was made of this view to the Government, so far as I am aware. What is the situation then? We are asked by my hon. and gallant friend, who understands these matters so well, that when full opportunity has been given to the Boer leaders to express themselves in a constitutional way, and when that opportunity has long gone past, and the Legislative Council have passed the Ordinance, to yield to a belated and unconvincing demand made at the last moment, when everything else had failed. But who are the Boer leaders, and what title have their views upon this question to prevail upon the views of hon. Members opposite? Do they think that anybody speaks from an eminence on this subject when he is in favour of dealing with the shortage of labour in the Transvaal by the expedient of forced labour? Do they think that anybody whose opinion is of much weight in this matter wishes to deal with this difficulty by the expedient of breaking up the native locations, and forcing the natives of Africa into the mines, or on to the farms by such methods? Now let us investigate for a moment the pretensions of these gentlemen on this point. I am not blaming them for having their views, but I do blame hon. Gentlemen opposite for regarding them as great authorities upon this topic to whom we ought to defer. General Botha is of opinion that there is a great shortage of labour on the farms, and the method which he suggests in his evidence before the Commission is that you should break up the native locations and enforce squatters law. General Delarey does not go so far, but General Cronje and several others whom I can quote if necessary, gave evidence before the Labour Commission complaining of the shortage of labour on their own farms, and suggesting the expedient of enforcing squatters law (which prevents any natives beyond five families ever settling on a farm), of breaking up the native locations or native reserves, like Basutoland, and of driving them out of the land which belongs to them—in order to do what? To serve them on their farms. This is a matter which I can assure the House is very relevant at this time. If instead of bringing Chinamen, who come voluntarily, who earn far better wages than they would in their own country, under circumstances which I shall detail to the House in a moment, if instead of bringing these tough members of an old and tough civilisation to do this work, which we believe they are anxious and willing to do, you are to take—and I know nobody who would be more averse to this than hon. Members opposite—if you are to take the Boer population by their leaders as desirous of breaking up the native locations, of forcing the natives into the mines, of driving them off the land that was theirs, then I say that you have the Boer leaders in a position which is intolerable to Members of this House and, I believe, to anybody who rightly regards the native populations of Africa.

It is said that we ought not to have been satisfied with this long and deliberate ascertainment through a constitutional method of the opinions of the Transvaal people. It is said that we ought to have a referendum. I cannot argue everything twice over, so I must ask the House to assume in my favour that it was established upon undoubted authority that this problem was a very urgent problem—that the necessity of going forward was an urgent and vital necessity in the economic condition of the country. I will tell the House why in a sentence. The mines are 30,000 natives short of the number employed in the pre-war period. We are told that we ought to have a referendum on this matter. Such an expedient is absolutely unknown in any portion of the British Empire. It is absolutely without precedent, and it would raise in all the Crown Colonies questions of the most difficult nature. But there is a more serious objection than any of these. At a moment when we are more than ever anxious to do everything we can to bind together the two peoples — Boer and British—it would raise questions about the franchise which I think anybody who wished these two peoples to live together in peace and harmony would regard as most undesirable at the present moment. Of course, although this does not seem to be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite, it would take a long time to settle these questions in the first instance. Say it took two or three months to settle and adjust the various claims which the Boers would desire to have represented. How long would it take to form a register when you had settled these questions? I am advised by Lord Milner that it would take at least six months to form that register. Lord Milner is an authority on these things, and I assure hon. Members opposite that he is probably within the mark, because it took six months to form the register of the Johannesburg municipality, which is a much more limited area, and the population of which gave every assistance. Therefore we have at least nine months, and probably twelve months, before this referendum could be taken. Then what is the question to be? That is not a very easy thing to settle, moreover, as I can assure the House after the experience we have had of the Boers there is not much encouragement to think that we should get their real opinion even if we had a referendum. I therefore pass that by as really out of the question.

Now, Sir, I think it was admitted by the mover of this Amendment that blacks cannot do the work. We have heard almost ad nauseam of the endeavours which have been made to procure their assistance.

*MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: I said that I would not enter into that question.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I will not commit the hon. Member to that opinion, but I do not think there is much dispute about it on the part of those who have studied the question. I do not found myself entirely upon the Bloemfontein Conference, or upon the Report of the Commission which followed, or upon the votes of the Legislative Council, but what I do ask the House to consider is this. Does not the thing speak for itself? If you had no evidence by the Commission, no evidence by the Legislative Council, no evidence by the Bloemfontein Conference—even then does not the thing speak for itself? The mine-owners have been all over Africa endeavouring to secure African labour. They have been, through the Colonial Office to West Africa, through the Foreign Office to Central Africa and Uganda, through the German Foreign Office to East Africa, and they have been as far as Morocco and Liberia, but, chiefly through the opposition of the various Governments concerned, they have not been able to obtain the labour they require. I do not blame the Governments; they do not think they have sufficient population to spare for this work. But what I do ask the House to believe is that an honest and strenuous endeavour has been made to get labour from Africa itself. The correspondence in the Blue-book will show that in a moment. Notwithstanding these strenuous and persistent efforts, you have the fact that, although there is an equipment of machinery adequate to produce 60 per cent. more than in the pre-war period, you are actually 30,000 natives short in the mines compared with the number previously employed. More than that, you have also the circumstance that in Johannesburg itself the municipality were unable to obtain 1,000 natives to do the necessary municipal work. There are the facts; they speak for themselves; they cannot be contradicted. The reasons for these facts are principally that the war itself made a great disturbance; you have had very large works of reconstruction in the Transvaal, you have had the making of railways, the construction ot docks, Cape Colony, irrigation works, the work of rebuilding the farms and the necessary construction of work to make good the waste of the war. If that be the case, and nobody can deny that it is, you have an absolutely certain cause of the shortage in African labour, and an absolutely certain and recognised effect in the shortage in the mines, and even in the Johannesburg municipality.

I am afraid I have detained the House at considerable length, but this is a very serious matter, and I wish to give hon. Members all the information I can. The blacks cannot be found to do this work. I affirm most strongly that the whites will not do it. Let me say, in connection with what has been stated by the seconder of the Amendment, that New Zealand and Australia are the only self-governing Colonies which have protested against the introduction of Chinese labour. [SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS : The Cape.]

*MR. LYTTELTON : Yes, I was wrong there is the Cape, that is a self-governing colony. I entirely agree that their opinions ought to be, and they have been, respectfully weighed by me; but they are not conclusive upon this matter, though they are entitled to every consideration. What is the opinion of Canada on this subject? Have all the dreadful consequences which my hon. and gallant friend portrayed exhibited themselves in British Columbia? Why, the Chinese were an absolute necessity. As in this case, I believe the necessity was temporary, and needed to give a basis to an industry which when formed the outside labour could be dispensed with. In Africa you want to underpin a temporary structure, and afterwards to fill in the foundations from the ordinary source of supply. Though the opinion of Australia ought to be respected, I think it was under some delusion as to the problem presented that the opinion was arrived at. Australia and New Zealand are white communities, and I have a good deal of sympathy with the desire to keep them pure white men's countries, but the problem is entirely different in South Africa. In Australia you have a standard of labour and the level is set by white men, but in Africa, where you have blacks in the majority of the population, it is inevitable that the standard is set by black labour; and the opinion I have formed from the facts is that where you have Kaffirs doing practically all the unskilled work of the colony, you may despair of ever getting white men from this country to compete with the unskilled labour of the Kaffir in his own country. I may challenge any Member who may follow me in this debate to give a single instance, except where it has been tried experimentally, of black and white men working side by side in South Africa. As Sir Charles Pearson wrote in 1895—

> "When the Kaffir does the unskilled labour, the British race begin to consider all labour but that of the highest kind dishonourable."

We may consider this an unfortunate fact, but I would ask the hon. Member for Battersea, who can speak from experience in Africa and knowledge of the working classes, does he believe that a decent working man would emigrate from this country, not to better himself, not to place himself in a different class to that in which he is in this country, but to do unskilled work in competition with Kaffirs? I say the feeling against it is universal, and I can say so from knowledge derived not only from people connected with the mines, but from our own soldiers and others. Not even the poorer Dutch will do Kaffir work for any time, though they might for a little while at three times the pay a Kaffir would receive. Even then, they would come to their employer and say—"Our self-respect has been degraded by doing this work which it is customary to leave to black men." It was the same thing with disbanded troopers in distress, and even with navvies. A thousand navvies were sent out for railway work, men who had been employed before on Government construction work, and they were obviously skilled workmen, for when they were put on piecework they multiplied their cubic feet of production from two to eight. If they had worked at that pressure all the time, though it would have been far from being economical, the result would have been less deplorable than it was. The men became disgusted at doing work to which the feeling of the white inhabitants was opposed; they were influenced by their surroundings; they grew sulky and discontented, and were brought home after being there seven months, because to have kept them there for five months more would have cost the Government an extra £40,000. I ask any Member interested in emigration—Would any working man ever leave this country for the purpose of doing unskilled work?

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): Of course he would.

*MR. LYTTELTON: I ask as a matter of fact—Is there any considerable stream of emigration from this country except with the hope of rising in the world? Look at the nature of the case. Men leave their homes, their kith and kin, and the enjoyments to which they have been accustomed. I venture to say that the only chance of ever getting white labour into the South African mines is first to fill up, if you can, your farming population and your skilled labour at the mines, and then in the future, as they prosper and multiply, possibly then, in time, you may overcome the deep-seated repugnance of white men to compete with black. The only experiment there has been was made by Mr. Creswell, of whom I wish to speak with the greatest respect. He is entitled to full measure of praise for his experiment. He made it in opposition to the whole experience of mining experts, who, I admit, may have been biassed, as men are biassed in matters affecting their own interests. But I think it is a very strange case when every engineer of the Rand is of an opinion contrary to that of the gentleman who made the experiment, and we have the known facts with which I have troubled the House. But I have here a letter, an extract from which I will read, and it throws considerable light on the white labour experiment. Mr. William Mather, late general secretary to the Transvaal Mining Association, replying to Mr. Creswell's statement on the subject, says—

> "After the close of the war Lord Kitchener gave his consent to the employment of ex-Regulars and Irregulars in the mines, and an arrangement was come to with the Chamber of Mines that they should be paid at the rate of 5s. a day all found, that being the standard rate of pay of Irregulars in the field. On all the mines except the Village Main Reef this arrangement was adhered to. Mr. Creswell did not observe the conditions; he only paid the men 5s. a day, refusing to pay £6 5s. per month for board and lodging, and also an additional 22s. for bedding."

> "The matter was taken up by the Transvaal Mining Association, and a number of summonses were issued against Mr. Creswell and orders obtained for the payment for board and lodging, so that, instead of the cost of the unskilled white man being 5s. a day it was actually 10s., as against 54s. a month and board and lodging amounting to 25s. paid to the native, giving the native £3 19s. a month, as against £12 15s. a month paid to the unskilled labour."

This is a matter of considerable interest in relation to this experiment, which, after all, was carried out on a small scale and under peculiar conditions on the Rand. Now if we ask for white men to come in—and I invite the attention of Labour Members to this—the result of bringing in unskilled white labour is not necessarily the employment of more British labour; there may be labourers of other nationalities, and the effect would be, not to increase British employment on the Rand, but to diminish it and to reduce the wages paid for it. Of course, it is perfectly clear that, if you introduce these foreigners in competition with British labour, inasmuch as their standard is much lower than the British one, the effect would be to lower the standard of wage. I was interested to see a statement made by the Rand correspondent of the official organ of the Labour Party of which, I think, we shall hear a good deal, or at any rate, of the body which the paper represents. I find in the Labour Leader of 16th January a letter from its Rand correspondent containing a criticism of this proposal to introduce whites to do unskilled work. I am aware that view has not prevailed with the Labour representation itself, and I am aware that a resolution has been passed against it. I have mentioned it as showing that the Rand correspondent of the Labour Party gives that view. I find also it is echoed by another paper which has some considerable weight and knowledge.

There are only two more topics with which I shall trouble the House, but I think they are important topics. I have endeavoured to show that the economical necessity is vitally urgent, and the political necessity also. I have endeavoured to show that the opportunity of getting further natives is for the present impossible; though I hope it will soon increase. I have endeavoured to show also that the idea of getting Britons to go out from this country to compete with the blacks in the mines is a hopeless dream. I hope that I have established these propositions, but I quite recognise that hon. Members have a right to say that the burden rests on us of showing that the remedy proposed to meet a great economic difficulty—the introduction of Chinese labour—can be introduced into that country without moral taint and without presenting the aspect or the reality of slavery. It is a perfectly legitimate demand, and I trust that the House will allow me to meet it shortly, and I hope conclusively. I entirely agree that the provisions for the reception and accommodation of the wives and families of these people should be clearly made. I undertake that they shall be made. We were advised in this matter by men the most experienced in the whole Empire on the subject of Chinese labour. We were advised that the coolies would not go without their womenfolk. Manifestly it would be most wrong that they should go without their womenfolk. I undertake that if they wish to bring their wives and families they shall be allowed to do so. [HON. MEMBERS: All of them?] All of them. I did not give a specific answer to a Question on this point the other day because the form of the question was—Would they all be accompanied by their wives and families if they wished it? Obviously it might be desirable for the labourers to go out in one ship and their wives and families in another. I undertake, on behalf of the Government, that all the coolies who desire to bring their wives and families shall have the opportunity to do so. If more is desired, then I undertake to fully consider and give effect to any reasonable demand made in connection with the matter. Hon. Members must remember that at present this matter is being considered by Mr. Evans, who is the representative of the Transvaal Government, and who has a life-long experience of Chinese coolies. Lord Milner had the advantage of the advice, when on the spot here, of Sir F. Swettenham, who has had thirty-three years experience of Chinese coolies in the Malay States. He has thoroughly discussed the matter with Lord Milner face to face. We have this advantage also, that we have the Chinese Government negotiating for and seeing to the rights of their labourers, so that in the first place you have a distinct undertaking that this provision shall be made for the accommodation of the families, and in the next place you have the best advice on the subject which can possibly be obtained, and, finally, you have the Chinese Government watching over the interests of their subjects.

Let it not be forgotten that this is no new thing which hon. Gentlemen seem to have opened up. I do not blame them for calling attention to it. It is quite right that they should do so. Coolies have been introduced under indentures into Natal, Trinidad, Fiji, Borneo, and British Guiana. The mover and seconder of the Amendment drew a lurid picture of the lot of these people; but, fortunately, their accounts do not conform to experience. They are drawn out of their own heads. I will make good that statement in a moment. At any rate I do not blame them for the vividness of their imagination. I do not intend to say more on the moral question than that. I honour the source from which this question was introduced. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of Rochester and Worcester are men whom all who know them honour and revere, and I understand that in another place the Archbishop of Canterbury was fully satisfied with the assurances which he received from my noble friend Lord Onslow.

There is one more point, and it affects not only the Chinese but also the community into which they are going. I think hon. Gentlemen were perfectly entitled to ask that safeguards should be given by His Majesty's Government. I trust that we have done so. The next and last question is the alleged slavery or condition of slavery into which the Chinese are supposed to be projected. Let me describe briefly the precautions. An official, appointed by the Transvaal Government, and wholly independent of the mines and responsible to the Government here, is to go to China, and on that side, in China, he is to secure and warrant by his certificate that every Chinaman who embarks upon this undertaking shall fully understand its nature and its terms; and, further, security is to be made for his comfort and sanitation during transit. He is then to be received at the port of entry to the Transvaal—which is at present intended to be Durban—by someone who is again to explain to him fully and carefully all the conditions of service. When he arrives at the mines he is no doubt to live in what is a Chinese village or location. It is considerably different from a native compound, because it is a place fitted for the reception of Asiatics, and is to be carefully prepared by those who know Asiatic customs and habits. It is to be prepared for him by those on the spot. We have heard some ridiculous exaggerations of the compound system which obtains there already, and which, it is said, is to be applied to the Chinese also. I do not know whether my hon. and gallant friend has seen a compound. He said that this was a cruel system. It is not so. Let me compare the language of exaggeration used by hon. Members who have not seen these compounds with the language of truth and sincerity used by one who has seen them, and who is one of the most zealous workers in the humanitarian movement of this country. Canon Scott Holland, the editor of the Commonwealth, a Christian social magazine, writes that the visitor to the mines is first distressed to think that the native should have been plunged straight from his kraal into the midst of a roaring manufacturing industry. But the visitor soon observes how shrewd the native is in avoiding bad and unfair conditions, and how much profit he manages to secure from his employment—

> "He walks off with his gold and gets him wives, and returns when he wants more to a place where he finds himself cared for. He is having no unhappy time, and his genial gaiety of heart carries him well through it."

I venture to think that that paragraph, written by a man who does more in a year for humanity in this country than many of us do in a lifetime, and one who has visited the native compounds, blows into a thousand fragments the absurd pictures of life in the compounds which have been presented to us this evening The attacks which have been made on the Transvaal Government have been unworthy and unjust. It was suggested that the mine-owners had got rid of every official of the Government who objected to the importation of the Chinese. Mr. Wybergh, who was referred to as having been got rid of because he opposed this project, was found by a Commission, long before the question of Chinese labour was raised, to have been incompetent for his office. By the kindness and forbearance of Sir Arthur Lawley he was allowed to remain in the employment of the Government for several months and then to resign on the pretext that he differed from the policy of the Government, and, after having been treated with such exceptional generosity, he thought it right to say that he had retired because of the capitalist leanings of the Government. I am sure Mr. Wybergh regrets that action now; yet his case is referred to by hon. Gentlemen opposite as an instance of the manner in which the Transvaal Government swept from their path every official who wished honestly to do his duty. I do not think hon. Gentlemen are in a position to know the reasons why Mr. Creswell resigned; and as for Mr. Monypenny, the editor of the Star, he wrote in that paper—which, be it remembered, was the property of the mine-owners and the most powerful journal in the Transvaal — able and vigorous expressions of his own opposition to the policy of the mine-owners. I do not think that many newspaper proprietors in this country would allow so able a pen as that of Mr. Monypenny to be employed for months at their own expense in endeavouring to demolish their policy. I do not say that the mine-owners should be exempt from criticism, but I do say that the language which has been used about them is ungenerous and unfair. Sir George Farrar, the protagonist in behalf of the mine-owners, is a man of the highest character

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Was he one of the concoctors of the fraudulent "women and children" letter.

*MR. LYTTELTON: Sir George Farrar is a gallant man. He fought in the war and gained distinction in the field, and I think he and his colleagues ought to be credited with that sincerity of view with which, throughout the observations I have addressed to the House, I have endeavoured to credit their opponents.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said he had never listened to a more dishear ening speech. Where were all the assurances that had been given regarding the future of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony at the time of the war—a war which cost this country £250,000,000 and 20,000 lives ? How did we stand at the present moment ? The ex-Colonial Secretary told the House and the country only six months ago that in return for all these sacrifices the future of the Transvaal had the rosiest prospect. But now they had the present Colonial Secretary declaring that the Transvaal was on the brink of ruin. We had been told that by annexing the Transvaal we should acquire a white man's country ; now we learn that, while there might be a few superior whites, the working population must be black or yellow. The right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary complained that they, on that side of the House, had accused him of rushing the debate. He repeated the accusation ; the debate had been rushed with indecent haste, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was the best proof of that. The Colonial Secretary had told the House that he was drawing up regulations in reference to the importation and treatment of the Chinese immigrants of the most minute and far-reaching kind ; but the House had been asked to discuss this important question without having these regulations before it. The right hon. Gentleman said that the position of the Chinese in their compounds, as fixed by his regulations, constituted a moral question which the House had to decide. But the House was incompetent to decide it before it had his regulations before them. Was the Ordinance to over-ride the regulations or the regulations to over-ride the Ordinance ? He asked the right hon. Gentleman not to give his assent to the Ordinance until his regulations were made part of it. Then the right hon. Gentleman described the life of the Chinese immigrants in the Transvaal and said that he was going to allow them the choice of bringing their women and children there. That was contrary to the Ordinance as it stood at present. To hear the right hon. Gentleman speak of the regulations for the Chinese compounds one would have imagined that these compounds, to contain 300,000 or 400,000 Chinese, were going to be a sort of garden cities ; but in his opinion they would be concentration camps of the most hideous description. The right hon. Gentleman admitted in the opening part of his speech that this was a question of right or wrong. That was the issue on which the Opposition were prepared to appeal to the House and country. They maintained that it was a question of wrong which ought to be put right. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal was that a British colony was to be overrun by Chinese, but before making such a far-reaching proposition he should have made out an overwhelming case ; and he appealed to the House whether the right hon. Gentleman had made out anything of the sort.

Mr. Sydney Buxton.

The right hon. Gentleman had divided his observations into four or five points, and he wished to say, first of all, a few words on what the right hon. Gentleman called the constitutional question. The right hon. Gentleman said that the matter was one for the Transvaal, and not for us, to decide.

He would be inclined to agree if the Transvaal was a self-governing colony, but, even in that case, as grave Imperial interests were concerned, it would be a very serious question whether the right of veto should not be exercised. But the Transvaal was not a self-governing colony. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the late Colonial Secretary could put it into the category of a self-governing colony by merely saying that he would treat it as such. If the inhabitants of the Transvaal were competent to decide such a momentous question as this, they were fit for, and entitled to, self-government, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give them self-government at the earliest possible moment. But the Transvaal was a Crown colony, and the right hon. Gentleman was directly responsible with the House of Commons and the country for its government. He was not ashamed to say that he was not willing to take the responsibilty of deciding such a momentous question for them. If the result turned out to be disastrous, the responsibility and blame would not be on the people of the Transvaal, but on the House of Commons. Moreover, the Secretary of State for the Colonies was not giving a mere passive assent, but was making himself a very active participant in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman was making himself responsible for transferring the Chinese to the Transvaal, for looking after them there, and for taking them back to China, and that was a very serious responsibility. The right hon. Gentleman argued cogently against a Referendum, but he himself thought that the only basis on which the question could be decided was to accord self-government to the colony, and let the duly elected representatives determine it. The right hon. Gentleman said, in his despatch to Lord Milner, that no direct Imperial interest was involved. On the contrary he himself said that very important Imperial interests were involved, and that the Colonies were entitled to have a voice in regard to the matter. It seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman gave a wrong impression in regard to the feeling at the Cape and in South Africa generally. The right hon. Gentleman said that opinion at the Bloemfontein Conference was in favour of this proposal. He stated that the conference declared that labour was insufficient, and that it recommended the introduction of Chinese labour, under restrictions. But the right hon. Gentleman must have forgotten the very limited and grudging terms of the Bloemfontein Conference. The conference stated that it was of opinion that the permanent settlement in South Africa of Asiatic races would be injurious and should not be permitted, but that it could agree to it only if the industrial development absolutely required the introduction of unskilled labour. That was different to what the right hon. Gentleman conveyed to the House. Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to discuss the question as to whether the Boers were or were not in favour of the introduction of Chinese labour. But that question could only be decided by granting self-government to the colony. On whose authority was the proposal based? It should be remembered that the Commission, on whose report practically the whole of this agitation, and the ordinance also, had been based, was specifically excluded from dealing with any of the questions as to an alternative supply of labour. On three material points—whether the cost of working could not be reduced, whether white labour could not be further employed, and whether the employment of Asiatics would be advantageous or otherwise, the Commission could not take evidence, or even express an opinion. By these terms of reference they were confined solely to the question whether there was a sufficient supply of native labour. It is true that the Commission did make some remarks on the subject of white labour. But it was quite clear from the case of Mr. Creswell and others, that there was practically no evidence forthcoming in connection with the question of the introduction of white labour.

The right hon. Gentleman impressed on the House the urgency of this matter, and he asked hon. Members to suggest an alternative. The alternative he ventured to suggest for the Transvaal was to "go slow." There was no doubt that the Transvaal had been developed at too rapid a rate. There were two interests involved. There was the Transvaal Government and the mine-owners. The right hon. Gentleman said that the House of Commons had placed on the Transvaal a large liability, but this was the work of the Transvaal Government itself. And it now endeavoured to justify its position in regard to the debt and the financial position, and to save its reputation, by bolstering up the country through the introduction of Chinese labour. He did not deny that there was at the present moment a deficiency of labour in the Transvaal, but he did not quite understand the arguments on which the right hon. Gentleman based his case. He stated that there were less Kaffirs by 30,000 at work on the Rand than before the war. But the evidence before the Commission showed that the Kaffir was far more efficient than formerly, Lord Milner himself estimating the advantage at 30 per cent. That would not leave the deficiency of 30,000 which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned. Then he himself did not think that the mine-owners had done their best to prove the absolute necessity of Chinese labour by first giving all the other alternatives a proper trial.

It was a most significant fact that while up to last July there was a monthly increase in the number of Kaffirs coming into the mines, that increase ceased on the appointment of the Commission. He could not think that was a mere coincidence. The right hon. Gentleman assumed that the hon. mover of the Amendment was desirous of superseding all the Kaffir labour by white labour. That was not so. What they did point out, and with truth, was, that if the mine-owners were prohibited from bringing in Chinese labour and had to avail themselves of the existing Kaffir labour or of white labour the proportion of whites to Kaffirs would be increased. The right hon. Gentleman had overlooked the fact that already considerable steps had been taken in that direction. Before the war the number of Kaffirs per stamp was something like sixteen. It was now, as he understood, only nine or ten. And while before the war the proportion of whites to Kaffirs was something like one in fifteen, it was now one in seven or eight. That showed that under the pressure of real necessity white labour in the mines had been increased in proportion to Kaffir labour, and he thought that it was quite certain that if that pressure were removed the proportion would unquestionably diminish instead of increasing. He did not agree that the experiments that had been made in the direction of white labour had been fair tests. It had been stated that test experiments had been tried in the direction of white labour, but all the evidence went to show that no bonâ fide attempts had been made under proper conditions. The experiments had been made with discharged soldiers who did not take kindly to the work; while in regard to Mr. Creswell's experiments he had not had time to perfect them. The matter was very much in a nutshell. The whole point was whether, in the first place, even if a deficiency of labour could be shown to exist to the extent the right hon. Gentleman attempted to show, we should be justified in introducing Chinese labour. In the second place, the right hon. Gentleman had to show that there was not a considerable amount more of Kaffir labour available in South Africa, which, combined with economy of writing, machinery, and increased white labour, would not largely supply the deficiency. The right hon. Gentleman had not made out his case for the introduction of labour at all, and still less for the introduction of Chinese labour. He believed the conscience of this country and also that of the Colonies would be revolted if this Ordinance were passed and carried out. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that if a certain number of Chinese were allowed as an experiment the number would not necessarily be increased. But why should that be so. They were told that if the Chinese were not allowed to be brought in, now, the Transvaal would go to pieces, but hon. Members must remember that when, in the course of a few years, necessity arose for a further number this same argument would be used, and with far greater force than it was being used now. If they once opened the sluice the Transvaal would be deluged with this yellow flood. On political grounds he protested against the proposal. If it were agreed to, it would diminish and not increase the number of permanent British settlers. On economic grounds he could not believe that it was to the interest of the country that these mines should be too quickly developed at once and the gold exhausted. On moral grounds he objected to the introduction of Chinese into South Africa. If this Ordinance were carried out it would be a blot on the scutcheon of England, and if the law was allowed to pass he hoped a future Government would find it possible to repeal it.

*MR. MARTIN (Worcestershire, Droitwich) said that he approached this subject from his experience of the introduction of Chinese labour into North Borneo. He had no hesitation in saying that the Chinese who came there, when properly inspected and selected, made most excellent citizens, taking their place in the municipal government and serving on juries, which were generally composed of one-third Europeans, one-third Chinese, and one-third natives. In all the trades which they undertook he found them also excellent citizens. Of course it was not exactly the same thing in this case. North Borneo was a tropical country where white men could not work in the fields and on the tobacco lands. But the whole problem before them, so far as he could see, was whether the mines of the Transvaal could be worked by white man's labour. From the evidence which he had gathered it seemed to him that not only could they not get white men to work in the mines at all, but even if they could, they would not work with Kaffirs, any more than white men could be got to work with the negroes on the cotton plantations in America. If that were not the case there would be an end to all the trouble in England with regard to the unemployed, because they could go out there and find work. The whole gist of the question was whether or not the Europeans could work in the lowest grades of work in these mines. There seemed to have been much misapprehension in the House as to who the mine-owners were. It was true that there was one firm which controlled a large amount of interest in South Africa, but beyond that the mines were cut up into thousands of shares which were held all over England. The mining capitalists were not the people in South Africa, but the hundreds of thousands of shareholders in England and other places. So far as the mine managers were concerned they tried to act honestly by the shareholders. All these things ought to be made quite clear in the first instance, so that they might enter into this subject without predjudice. He had been told that one company had three and a half millions of capital employed at temporary interest in London waiting to be spent on machinery and other things connected with mines as soon as labour could be secured. There were many more companies in the same position, and unless sufficient labour could be secured it would be impossible to carry out the investment of this capital in the way intended. He thought it was only right, therefore, if they were putting the prosperity of the Transvaal first, that before they refused to sanction the importation of Chinese labour they should be absolutely convinced that the work in the mines of the Transvaal was whiteman's labour. He did not think it was, and certainly the mover and seconder of the Amendment had not proved their case in that respect.

*DR. MACNAMARA thought the Colonial Secretary had done General Botha an injustice by saying he had kept back until the last few days his views as to the inadvisability of introducing Chinese labour into the Transvaal. As far back as 15th September, when under examination before the Labour Commission, General Botha attempted to state his views on the subject, but the Chairman of the Commission would not allow him to do so. The Legislative Council, the Colonial Secretary, and Sir George Farrar, had all rested their case on the finding of the Labour Commission. That being so, he had naturally turned to the proceedings of that body to find the grounds on which the demand for Chinese labour was based. Would it be believed that no mention of the question was permitted before the Commission. The Chairman would not allow the subject to come up, because it was not within the terms of the reference. That was, to say the least of it, extremely curious. The Commission was appointed in July last; the agitation in favour of Chinese labour had been active for twelve months, and it was somewhat curious that the question should have been especially excluded from the scope of the inquiry. In February, Mr. Ross Skinner was sent away with a Commission to ascertain the best method of introducing Chinese labour; in April Sir George Farrar made a speech advocating the proposal; in June Lord Milner showed that he was in favour of the introduction, under proper restrictions of Asiatic labour. In the face of those facts, how was it that from an inquiry instituted in July the question was excluded. The Labour Commission referred to the scarcity of labour, but it talked round the subject in a way that was not very illuminating to persons anxious to ascertain the real reasons for the scarcity. After reading the whole of the evidence he had come to the conclusion that the Report deliberately evaded the two real issues set up by the bulk of the evidence, viz., the question of the reduction of the rate of wages (which was only incidentally mentioned in the Report), and the question of the treatment of natives (which was not mentioned at all), From the evidence it appeared that the Basutos were kicked about and treated with great indignity, and that when maimed for life no compensation whatever was given them.

*MR. SPEAKER said he did not see how the point was relevant to the question before the House. The matter to which the hon. Member was referring was the treatment in the past of native labour in the mines. That was a different question from the importation of Chinese labour in the future.

DR. MACNAMARA said he was endeavouring to suggest the alternative of black labour. With regard to the treatment of Zulus, all he would say was, that if the evidence was true, there had never been a greater disgrace to the Union Jack than that such things should have been done under its auspices. The House was asked to agree to the Ordinance because the Legislative Council had adopted it. In another place the hope had been expressed that the Transvaal would be allowed to settle its affairs in its own way. If the Transvaal had been a self-governing colony there would be general assent to such a proposition. But it was not, and was not likely for a long time to be a self-governing colony. He had never yet said a single syllable in disparagement of Lord Milner, but having carefully read the Reports and the correspondence, he was beginning to lose faith in the judgment and impartiality of the man at the head of affairs in South Africa. The impression conveyed to him by the despatches was that Lord Milner looked at things as he had thought they ought to be. For instance, in his despatch of 3rd January, referring to the feeling in South Africa on this question, Lord Milner stated—

> "There is no change in the general aversion to Asiatics as permanent residents. But those who carry this aversion to the point of refusing to admit Asiatics as indentured labourers under condition of repatriation, even in the face of a proved insufficiency of other labour, are a small minority both among Boer and British."

If those who objected were only "a small minority," they were an extremely nimble stage army, because on nearly every other page of the Blue-book there appeared resolutions of protest, and so forth. Lord Milner further stated—

> "There is in every part of South Africa a number of men of unquestionable sincerity who are opposed in principle to imported labour under any circumstances. But I believe it is quite a minority, even in the Cape."

That was on 3rd January, 1904. On 5th December, 1903, Dr. Jameson wrote to the Governor—

> In view of the fact that legislation dealing with the introduction of Asiatics into South Africa will probably be considered during the coming session of the Legislative Council of the Transvaal, and bearing in mind the resolutions opposing such introduction unanimously passed by the Legislature of this Colony, I would approach your Excellency—now that no Parliament is in existence—with the view of steps being taken so as to ensure that, should they be admitted into any neighbouring colony, under no circumstances would it be possible for any imported Asiatic to find his way into this colony."

Even Dr. Jameson implored the Government not to allow any Asiatics to come into the Cape. Did this suggest that only a minority even in the Cape were against Chinese Labour? Lord Milner appeared to see things as he would like them to be. He, Dr. Macnamara, had been driven to the conclusion that this demand for Asiatic labour was the demand of financiers who were impatient, with their fingers itching to grasp the gold which was in the ground. The mover of the Amendment had replied to the suggestion that there was a financial crisis on the Rand, but there was another reason and it was that these people had got trades unionism on the brain, and they feared the solidarity of white labour, and the effect it would have, not only on labour but upon the government of the country generally. That came out in the Tarbutt letter, the Rudd letter, and the Milner reply to the White League. But they were afraid also of Chinese Trade Unionism. If they looked at the correspondence they would see how Mr. H. Ross Skinner described the customs of the Chinese in the various parts of the world. On page 79 he said—

> "A very potent force amongst the Chinese is a system of co-operation somewhat akin to freemasonry. They understand well the power and advantage to be derived from combination. In San Francisco there are six Chinese companies or guilds, and to one or other of these the great majority of Chinese immigrants used to contribute and become members. The system is far-reaching, but in the general application exercises a wholesome influence. These guilds transact business for their members, they supervise labour contracts, receive and deposit money, or remit same to China, and generally look after and take a lively interest in the welfare of the Chinese community. Another function of theirs is to make all the necessary arrangements, when so desired, to have the bones of deceased members sent to their relatives in China."

That was all right and proper, but Mr. Ross Skinner went on—

> "Such societies, comprehensive as they are, if established on the Rand, would have a very powerful bearing on the Chinese immigrants. In many ways, as in those mentioned above, they might be useful and beneficial, but their power might also become a danger."

Even the poor Chinaman was not to be allowed anything in the nature of combination. Then Mr. Ross Skinner proceeds—

> "To avoid such an emergency it is plainly desirable that all the present efforts to increase > the supply of Kaffir labour should be vigorously continued with a view to balancing, as far as possible, the supply of Kaffir, Chinese, and other unskilled labourers on the mines. This principle might also be adopted in the cases of Chinese from different districts. For instance, experience points to the fact that it is unlikely that northern men would co-operate with the southern Chinese."

Therefore the country was to be split up, and they had a holy dread of trades unionism even amongst the Chinese. The South African War lasted thirty-three months, it cost £250,000,000 of money, 25,000 British soldiers died, 25,000 came home permanently maimed, and quite another 25,000 women, children, and men must have died in the concentration camps, all for this, according to the Government. But so far as the people of this country were concerned it would not be for this. He was afraid that the hon. Member for Dulwich was not in the House. But it was significant that only a few hours before the declaration of the poll in Dulwich the following poster stared him in the face in Dulwich—

> "Electors of Dulwich, beware! If any attempts are made to lead you to believe that Dr. Rutherfoord Harris is in favour of the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa, remember it is a lie."

That poster was issued from the central committee rooms of the Member for Dulwich. He (the hon. Member) should watch with great interest the vote which the hon. Member for Dulwich gave on this Amendment, confidently looking for his support in the Division Lobby. The war, they were told, was not entered upon for Chinese labour, but to secure equal rights for all white men, the enfranchisement of the Uitlander, and to open up new fields of occupation for Britishers. The ex-Colonial Secretary, in a speech delivered on the 19th October, 1900, said the miners in the North of England voted Unionist at the last election, firstly, because they were patriots and Imperialists; and secondly, because the South African war was in a sense a miners' war, undertaken in order that justice might be done to the British miners in the Transvaal. At the present time there were two or three shiploads of miners out of employment coming back to this country, and the Government proposed to substitute for them Chinese. The Colonial Secretary seemed very much put about because the Ordinance for the introduction of Chinese had been termed cruel. He had no hesitation in repeating that it was cruel, and he invited hon. Members opposite to look for a moment at the conditions. The Chinaman was to perform unskilled labour only. What right had they to say that? He could only serve the person to whom he was indentured, but that person might lawfully transfer him to some other person, and he could not have any property whatever in minerals or precious stones. Surely to say he must not own precious stones was a work of supererogation. Surely all the precious stones in South Africa were already labelled, "With God Almighty's compliments to Eckstein, Bernstein, Goldstein, and all the other steins." In every way the Chinaman turned he had six months in gaol staring him in the face. It would also probably be provided that they should send his bones to China when he died, and that they should supply him with cheap materials for idols for his religious observances. That was the climax of hypocrisy. They sent missionaries out to win the Chinaman from his idolatry in China and now they were going to supply him with cheap Chinese idols in South Africa. In the face of all this he could not help thinking of the British soldier. He had not many ideals. But he believed that the British flag ensured freedom, fairplay, and justice for all. But what would the British soldier say when he knew that the sequel to all his suffering in South Africa was this indentured yellow slavery?

LORD ALWYNE COMPTON (Bedfordshire, Biggleswade): He will say it is all nonsense.

*DR. MACNAMARA said that if after this any self-respecting British soldier tore his South African medal from his breast and threw it in the gutter he would have his complete and entire support.

And, it being half-past Seven of the Clock, the debate stood adjourned till this Evening's sitting.

KING'S SPEECH (MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment [16th February] to Main Question [2nd February], "That an humble Address be presented to His Majesty, as followeth :—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,—

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Hardy.)

Which Amendment was—

"At the end of the Question, to add the words—'And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that it is highly inexpedient that sanction should be given to any Ordinance permitting the introduction of indentured Chinese labourers into the Transvaal Colony until the approval of the colonists has been formally ascertained.'"—(Mr. Herbert Samuel.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

*MR DUKE (Plymouth) said that this was a serious question for South Africa no one who had endeavoured to understand South African affairs could doubt. By common consent it had been recognised since the war that the Transvaal had become the centre of the political and social life of South Africa. The Dutch, the predominant race in South Africa before the war, took all their proceedings with that view, and that had been endorsed by the Government in founding the new political fabric to which the Colonial Secretary just now referred in a speech which excited so much interest in the House. The true capital of South Africa was Pretoria; the economic well-being of South Africa seemed to the Dutch and their successors to depend immediately on the prosperity of the Transvaal, and to require for its success the development of its resources as rapidly and completely as possible. The Colonial Secretary described the extraordinary political and social conditions in that country. A complete modern city founded in the midst of a wilderness, or what was very little less; the centre of the greatest gold producing industry of the world, and of great industries connected with that industry, and an unique centre of wealth and power; the rest of the Transvaal either in the more fertile parts devoted to the use of pasture or agriculture, or left in the hands of a barbarous population. The right hon. Gentleman had described the difficulty of the task of establishing the institutions of civilisation, and machinery of civilisation, so as to bring the Transvaal as a community into line and on a level with its great industrial centre. The difficulty had not appalled either Lord Milner or those whose material interest lay in South Africa—who had devoted themselves to building up the mining and kindred industries. It need not appal those in Cape Colony, Natal, and Orange River Colony, or those in our own country, who recognised that the prosperity of the Transvaal, and in the first instance its mining industry, was the keystone of the edifice of the future national greatness of South Africa. The hindrance to the mining industry at present was lack of labour—a shortage of nearly two-thirds. The mine-owners required 164,000 labourers for the existing stamps, and a further 30,000 for development work now necessary; they had only 68,000, and they would not be able to maintain that number because the attraction of the mines was different now to what it was before the war. Then the Kaffir was poor, he was now wealthy and able to indulge his tastes and live upon his own land without labour which he regarded as excessive, and devote himself to those pursuits and pastimes which pleased the native mind. Before the war 40s. and 50s. a month was paid for native labour; 70s. and 80s. a month was now offered, but the labourer did not come. It might be well or ill that that should be so, but if the capital sunk in the mines was to fructify and be redeemed from the soil in which it was sunk, they must deal with the problem of finding labour for the mines in place of the declining Kaffir labour of South Africa. The question had been grappled with. The South Africans had applied themselves to deal with this matter, which affected their substance and prosperity so much, and to find a solution to the problem.

Two solutions had been proposed besides that now under consideration. One was the old Dutch solution of making the Kaffir work, and he did not think that too much attention in this discussion could well be given to the absolutely frank and candid terms in which the old masters of the South African native had discussed his present position. Their advice—and it was typical of what the masculine mind of the Boer had always regarded as the proper method to be applied to his brother the black—was to break up the locations throughout South Africa and "make the Kaffir work," which meant having a system of forced labour. That a law should be passed to call upon them to work would not make them work. It could only be done by passing a law with the sanction of punishment behind it. If that were done, so said the Boers, there would be plenty of labour for all the necessities of the Transvaal. The best comment upon that with regard to the attitude of the natives in the South African Colonies was the fact that of the 68,000 labourers at present employed in the mines, 88 per cent. came from Portuguese territory. The meaning of it was that within British territory forced labour did not exist for the native, and it was open to him to please himself, so long as he maintained himself, whether he worked in the mines or not. [Hear, hear!] He presumed by that cheer that hon. Members approved of that state of things. [Hear, hear!] But if they approved of it they must take it with the difficulties it created. They could not applaud the native and graceful indolence of the Kaffir which induced him, instead of hastening to the toil of the mines, to retire from labour and live in leisured ease amongst his wives, and at the same time advise those whose material interest was in the mines that there was an abundant source of native labour in South Africa. What there was, in fact, was 12 per cent. of 68,000 to fill the place of all the Kaffirs in our own colonies who used to recruit the labour in the mines. The Boer policy with regard to the natives might be enforced and they might be dragooned to the mines, but when questions of this kind were discussed it must not be forgotten that to every white man in South Africa there were six or eight or perhaps ten Kaffirs, and among them means of information and political organisation such as did not exist before the war. He would not dwell further on that alternative policy except to remark that it had been tried and it had failed. The war had made the blacks in South Africa wealthy and they had realised it. It had shown them what was the real bone of contention between the white races and they had realised it. After the war the course which any sane Government had to take with the natives of South Africa was to develop them on peaceful lines and by educational means, and so bring them into the general scheme of civilisation. They would not coerce them into the mines nor would it be the policy of any party in this country to do so. The second alternative policy was that recommended by Mr. Creswell, who recommended that the present native supply should be eked out with the labour of unskilled whites.

MR. JOHN BURNS: Hear, hear!

*MR. DUKE: The hon. Member for Battersea applauded that alternative; would he have the unskilled white and the barbarian from Central Africa pull on the same chain, fill the same barrow, and sit at the same board? Was it part of the hon. Member's scheme of policy that we should bring the white man, our poor brother in a racial sense, and the black man our brother in the ethical sense, together in this way; that they should go down together and prosecute their labour under equal conditions. If that was the view with which hon. Members opposite opposed the Government and supported the policy of Mr. Creswell then he for one would be glad to hear what the trades unions would have to say upon that subject. That was a proposal for the degradation of white labour, and any Englishman who regarded the matter carefully and who considered whether he was ready to take his place side by side and hand in hand with a native lately brought from some remote part of the African Continent, and share his daily life with that man, would at once repel the suggestion that that was a mode in which this question could ever be solved. But efforts had been made to solve the difficulty in that very way. It was not owing to apathy or policy of the mine-owners that mines were lying idle and that stamps were hung up, it was because there was no labour. Mr. Creswell made his experiment, and practical miners in South Africa were unanimous in the opinion that it was a dead failure, that so far as profit from the mines was concerned the Creswell experiment was absolutely unsatisfactory. The experiment of employing unskilled white labour was also tried in the Rand mines. In order to keep up an average of 400 men during the seventeen months that that was being tried nearly 5,000 men were passed through those mines. Anything less economic could hardly be imagined. It was stated that one of the benefits of the Creswell system was that it would provide for something like continuity of white labour and steady progress, and the result of it had been that in seventeen months 5,000 men had been passed through certain mines in order to ensure an average for those mines of 400 labourers. No one up to this period of the debate had stayed to consider by what kind of white labour it was possible to work the mines. Englishmen had had a chance of going to South Africa for a long while. The Englishmen who went to South Africa would not go there to work for the wages which would maintain a native; to an Englishman those would be starvation wages. He was informed that an offer had been made by a syndicate in the East of Europe to send 25,000 Hungarians to South Africa. Was that the sort of thing for which hon. Gentlemen opposite were striving? Italian labour had been tried in South Africa, with the result that the skilled white British miner did not propose to stay if the class of Italian who could be obtained at the wages the mines could afford to pay was employed. Was it proposed to catch the intelligent labourer in this country, if possible, and to teach him mining in South Africa in three or four months, and so level down the wages of the skilled miner? [AN HON. MEMBER: No]. The Cornish miner in South Africa knew better. One ground of objection to Mr. Creswell's proposals was that one of his objects was to reduce the wages of miners in South Africa and if practicable to have unskilled labour under the supervision of skilled labour, so that after the unskilled labour saw the work of the skilled miner for a few months it would be an easier matter to deal with the present high wages of the skilled miner. Was that one of the objects for which hon. Gentlemen opposite were exerting themselves? Those Cornishmen who had transplanted to South Africa the mining industry in which their race had gained aptitude by a thousand years of mining experience, almost unanimously approved of the Labour Ordinance. They could take care and were taking care of their industry by a steadfast opposition to the proposal of Mr. Creswell, which, at present, commended itself most to those Members on the other side of the House who felt when they put what might be an insuperable obstacle in the way of the policy of His Majesty's Government with regard to South Africa, that they ought to suggest some sort of alternative. It was not common for them to suggest an alternative on the other side. It was much easier to give vent to highfaluting talk about soldiers' medals and Union Jacks. When they waved the Union Jack for any but a legitimate purpose they had to suffer for it.

MR. JOHN BURNS: Especially when there is slavery underneath.

*MR. DUKE: The suggestion of slavery had reference to the Ordinance. Now the Chinaman had been depicted in the course of the debate as anything but an estimable person, but the Chinaman was good enough to come without any sort of restriction to work in the East End of London. Yet some hon. Members were not willing that with any sort of restriction he should work in South Africa.

*MAJOR SEELY: Why do not you let him in free?

*MR. DUKE said the people of the country did not want him in free. When his hon. and gallant friend's comrades in New Zealand, Cape Colony, and other parts of the British Empire found that his hon. friend's keen desire was that the Chinaman should go and stay freely among them the enthusiasm which he now commanded would be somewhat damped.

*MAJOR SEELY: No.

*MR. DUKE: I am not sure then that I know what my hon. friend's position is.

*MAJOR SEELY: The objection is that if he is so distasteful to the inhabitants that they will not let him in as a free man—which it is admitted is undesirable—he should not be admitted with modified freedom, which we call modified slavery.

*MR. DUKE: My hon. friend would prefer the Chinaman at large to the Chinaman in a compound?

*MAJOR SEELY: No.

*MR. DUKE said his hon. friend's objection was to limitations being put on the Chinaman. He would prefer the Chinaman at large.

*MAJOR SEELY said that was not what he said.

*MR. DUKE said he had not yet gathered whether the objection was to a Chinaman at large or in a compound.

*MAJOR SEELY: Both.

MR. DUKE said his hon. and gallant friend's objection then was to the Chinese race, than whom there was no more industrious, painstaking, long-suffering, honest people, he believed, on the globe. Any man who knew anything of the commercial dealings of Chinese merchants throughout the Far East knew that the word of a Chinese merchant was as good as the bond of any man in London. The standard of commercial integrity among Chinese merchants could not be surpassed. His hon. and gallant friend had so deep-rooted a distaste for a Chinaman that he could not tolerate him in the British dominions. That was not, however, the objection upon which the Amendment was founded. He did not say it was only the political objection or that the defeat of the Government was the only real objective, but his gallant friend had brought himself to think this proposal, like so many other proposals of the Government, must be wrong. The suggestion that the Chinaman was to flood South Africa was a fallacy, like so many other fallacies scattered abroad in this debate. Of 4¾ millions of Chinese who had emigrated in twenty-five years, upwards of four millions had returned to China. They did not want to settle abroad. The inborn dislike of the European to some Asiatic races justified the Government in imposing upon the Chinese desiring to work in South Africa, some such conditions as those in the Ordinance. He did not believe that any man who declared his true mind on this subject would say that he desired to see South Africa flooded with free Chinese labour and that South Africa should run the risk of becoming a Chinese country. The great necessity of South Africa was labour, and the gold which was to be exported was to be the motive power of the development of the Transvaal—he had almost said the regeneration of South Africa. He did not shrink from considering the position of South Africa. Cape Colony, Natal, and the Transvaal had formed their plans upon the belief that the gold output of South Africa was to continue. It was a mechanical certainty if we permitted it to proceed. The complaint made against the Government by the supporters of the Amendment was that they would not put or continue an absolute barrier against the employment of Chinese. The Government proposed to allow Chinese labour there and to put certain restrictions upon it. Capital was locked up in vast undertakings, and the expenditure of the Transvaal had increased by 100 per cent. for the purpose of developing the country and paying the share of the burden of the war which the colony had to bear. The real question before the House was whether it should declare itself in favour of the present stagnant condition of South Africa, which might bring about a speedy ruin, or whether the Government should be encouraged and assisted in this proposal, which would supply some additional labour to the mines in South Africa, and set free the golden tide which was to renew its prosperity.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester) said he had given notice of an Amendment to the Amendment now before the House, but after consultation with a number of hon. Members he found the general opinion was that they should have a clear and distinct issue to vote upon, and that a second Amendment should not be put. He had put down his Amendment to the Amendment for this reason. The Amendment as it stood in the name of his hon. friend seemed to convey an impression that we would tolerate something in regard to slave labour if only it could be approved of or rejected, as the case might be, by a referendum. The Transvaal was a Crown colony, for which the Government of this country was almost, if not quite, as responsible as it was for the affairs of the home land; and what he objected to was to relieve, even in the slightest degree, the Government from the tremendous responsibility which they seemed to be assuming of the introduction of Chinese labour into that colony. He had a strong inclination to persevere with his Amendment, but as he had withdrawn it he would not pursue that part of his subject any further. He had the advantage of listening to the speech of the right hon. Member the Colonial Secretary, who, if he might say so, had made very good use of very rotten materials. The right hon. Gentleman utterly failed to prove his case, or to give a satisfactory reason why this great Assembly, which was the centre of the Empire, should be sitting there at the bidding of the gold-mine owners of Johannesburg to do their behest and rake the world through to provide them with cheap labour. To his honour be it said, the right hon. Gentleman particularly failed in that special behest. It would be further noticed that the right hon. Gentleman never once said that the Government approved of, and would fight, for the consummation of the Ordinance agreed to by the mining Parliament in Johannesburg. The nearest he got to it was to apologise for it. In the earliest part of his speech the right hon. Gentleman had assured the House that, if the Chinese came, they would be limited to certain areas, kept in compounds, not allowed to enter into competition with the higher grades of labour, and that they would be, all the time, mere beasts of burden of the lowest type. The right hon. Gentleman combated the suggestion that 300,000 Chinese were wanted. How did he know how many there would be once the flood-gates were opened? The Government's masters in Johannesburg would decide that, not the Government. They were the governors of Downing Street, and not the men on the Treasury Bench. The Colonial Secretary went on further to show that after all he would pamper the Chinese by bringing comforts into their villages, and by bringing their wives and children. A family averaged three children, and even if they limited the immigration to 100,000 men, that would mean the introduction of 500,000 Chinese into the Transvaal. It was said that if the Chinese escaped from the compound, or were away under permit for more than forty-eight hours, they could be arrested without warrant; but how could they arrest 500,000 people? The whole thing was preposterous and absurd. The Government were asking the House to agree to a proposal, which was being rammed down their throats by the gold-mining companies, for one purpose only—to allow the Chinese to come into South Africa to win gold at a somewhat less cost than they could get it by black or white labour. Once they agreed to that main principle, how were they going to put a limit upon it?

As he understood the Colonial Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman argued that if the Amendment prohibiting Chinese were carried, the resources of the gold authorities would not be exhausted; that if we rejected the Chinese, it did not follow that Britishers would take their place. He pointed out that there was cheap labour in Norway, Sweden, and Italy; but the distinguished Member for Plymouth had added another difficulty to Britons obtaining employment in the Transvaal. There were, he said, the Hungarians. [AN HON. MEMBER: And Poles.] Oh the Poles would be reserved for another advocate of this system of slavery; they were not firing all their shots at once. If they were reduced to the Hungarians, little as he sympathised with these slave-masters of Johannesburg, he hoped their bargain with the Hungarian workmen would be much more profitable and satisfactory than the War Office bargain with the Hungarians in regard to horses. There was room for improvement in that direction. The Colonial Secretary wished the House to understand that opinion did not run all in one channel in the Transvaal. He admitted that there were little differences and contrarieties in that colony; that he had had a petition. Was there a living man who remembered a single bit of history in connection with South Africa during the last seven or eight years. who would pay the slightest attention to any written or signed document coming from that tainted source. They had not forgotten a certain letter that was written and kept in order to be dated to suit the occasion. [Ironical MINISTERIAL laughter.] Yes, they could write letters and pigeon hole them for their own convenience, and it was easily understood that they would not be incapable of faking petitions, and using that gentle influence which was so well known in South Africa, and which had been so potent in many cases, to serve their ends in regard to getting up a petition in favour of Chinese labour. He had read the evidence in the Blue-books, and the Minority Report of the Labour Commission, which was not a Royal Commission at all. It was a sort of Tariff Reform Committee appointed in South Africa in order to vamp up public opinion in favour of cheap labour. There were lots of countries which would like cheap labour; there were lots of people in this country who would like cheap labour, and would not be particular as to the nationality to which it belonged. Were they going to run the risk of bringing shameful degradation on the British Parliament for the sake of aliens. How could they resist or reject appeals made by people nearer their own doors for cheap labour?

Now, in regard to the influence of these great capitalists, he did not object to them because they were foreigners; he did not care whether they were British or foreign—but he objected to them for pursuing methods to enslave black, white, or yellow labourers for the purpose of increasing their gains. He was against them and would oppose them to the best of his ability. What was the condition of things in Johannesburg at the present moment? The capitalists were all supreme, and Lord Milner, to judge from his despatches, seemed to be absolutely in their hands. He was not the High Commissioner of this Empire, sending home information simply stating facts. The whole of the despatches numbered 91 and 92 consisted of special pleading for his clients in Johannesburg; they were not the despatches of a statesman representing a great nation, sending home to his Government information which they ought to be in possession of. Not only was Lord Milner a partisan, but he actually used very thinly veiled threats that, unless the Government agreed to the demand of the gold authorities, they would repudiate the financial responsibilities of the Transvaal to this country. He had never read anything more improper in the whole course of his life, and certainly he thought this was a case for severe reprimand. Lord Milner admitted that there was some amount of loyalty in the Transvaal, but he said that if we pressed for the execution of these financial responsibilities we would be straining that loyalty to a degree of danger, and therefore he warned us to give every latitude to these people for their financial convenience. That meant, there was no doubt, for their financial profit. Last week, in order to show the undue influence which the great vested interests had in Johannesburg, he drew the attention of the Colonial Secretary to the delivery by the Post Office in this House, of circulars to Members of the House by some persons evidently interested in the success of the Motion for the importation of Chinese labour. The circular reached him by first post last Thursday morning, and the Blue-books containing Lord Milner's despatches were not in the hands of Members till Friday. A summary of these despatches had been obtained and printed somewhere and circulated to hon. Members.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Did the circulars come from South Africa?

MR. BROADHURST said that the circulars were neither dated not contained the printer's name, and there was no means whatever of tracing their origin. If hon. Members turned to page 7, and other pages, they would find that the body of the despatches was contained in the circular. Now, who obtained possession of the despatches? Who wrote the despatches at Johannesburg. Did Lord Milner write them, or some secretary of the Mine-owners' Association. It was an outrage on Parliamentary rights and privileges, and he hoped that the Colonial Secretary would pursue his investigations and get to know who had first access to these very important documents before they reached the Colonial Office, and before they were circulated to the Members of this House. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would stand no nonsense about the financial responsibilities of these millionaires. They could afford to pay. A poor labourer who failed in his public payment of the education rate to the local authority, was summoned before a bench of magistrates and a distress warrant was issued against him unless he paid up. There were plenty of available goods in South Africa to levy upon, if it were necessary, and he hoped it would be done. A few years back, because Venezuela did not pay some paltry debt, owing to he did not know whom, the Government sent battleships to bombard Venezuelan towns. Let them bombard these fellows in Johannesburg. [Laughter.] Well, they could bombard from guns on land as well as from guns at sea, and he would make very short work of these men if they threatened to refuse to fulfil their financial responsibilities.

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): Hear, hear!

Mr. BROADHURST said that he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman was getting so bright since he left the War Office. The Government were not going to get out of their difficulties in regard to Chinese labour by sheltering under the robe of Canon Scott Holland, nor any other authority. Hon. Members had to give a plain and distinct vote whether they were in favour of cheap yellow labour, whether they were in favour of slavery or in favour of freedom. Long speeches and reading extracts from petitions, and letters from men who had won great honour in the war would not avail on this occasion. They had tocome into the open. For the first time in his Parliamentary life, for the first time, perhaps, for many hundreds of years, they had witnessed the advent of a Government which had set up its representative to apologise and explain away the importation of foreigners into a British possession for no other reason than that these would work cheaper than British workmen. The Government were going to have it straight, and they should avoid all technicalities and stand up to receive their punishment. He and those who agreed with him were going to see who was for freedom and who for slavery. That was the issue they were going on in the division. They were going to discover those who thought it proper at the call or command of the gold authorities in South Africa, to forsake the traditions of our grand old country, of our liberty loving nation, that no slavery, black, white, or yellow, should exist, either for profit or pleasure on any spot of land where the British flag floated.

Mr. CUST (Southwark, Bermondsey) said he did not think it would be necessary to say much in answer to the remarks of the hon. Member who had just sat down. He complained of the ex parte nature of Lord Milner's despatches. There was only one point which might be noticed, and that was where the hon. Member declared that the Colonial Office and the Government of this country had never been able to stop the influx of Chinese, and the result would be that they would be doomed to such an influx of Chinese in South Africa as would be entirely beyond their power to control. If it was claimed that the Transvaal was a Crown colony then they could stop this influx. If, on the other hand, the hon. Member claimed that it was a self-governing colony then our responsibility falls from us. As long as they had the present system of government in South Africa, the moment the Chinese become inconvenient their influx could be stopped and their repatriation determined; but the moment they admitted that it was a self-governing colony the stopping of the influx of Chinese and their repatriation depended entirely upon the action of the self-governing colony. It seemed to him that the criticisms which had been made had been simply a rehash of the meeting in St. James' Hall. They were unable to follow the temperate meeting at St. James' Hall closely because of the prudential economy of space exercised by the newspapers in reporting it. They missed in that ungoodly fellowship of prophets a full flow of what Dr. Johnson would have called the anfractuosities of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Monmouth. They found strangely misplaced to-night the inverted intelligence of their hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Isle of Wight which was habitual to him, and they also found the clarion call of the Member for North Camberwell repeated to every man who had fought in South Africa to tear off his medals and trample them in the gutter should this Amendment be rejected. In the House of Lords everybody of authority, from a mining prospectus to the Sermon on the Mount, was quoted by the critics in condemnation of Chinese labour with the exception of the wise and temperate speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury. They had had similar speeches in the House of Commons. There was the speech of the Member for the Isle of Wight, who, like the hon. Member for Oldham and others who belonged to the new school of politicians, was fully prepared to give his faithful support to any Leader who would follow him. His hon. and gallant friend would follow any Leader on either side of the House, and he had availed himself of two opportunities of doing so within the last two days. His hon. and gallant friend had explained what he called the ludicrous nature of some of the statements made by those who favoured the policy of the Government. He told them that the average number of a Chinese family amounted to a wife and three children, but even if that be the case the same argument will apply to the constituency of the Isle of Wight, which was extraordinary of generation. The hon. Member for North Camberwell repeated the story of the soldiers who had fought in South Africa, and he told the soldier to tear off his medals and the badges of his honour and his Sovereign's approbation, and fling them in the gutter. The hon. Member for North Camberwell was one of the leading educationists in the House, and surely he would be better occupied in the ranks of the passive resisters than in stimulating mutiny in the ranks of the Army. The hon. and gallant Member complained that the question of the introduction of Asiatic labour was not brought up before the Commission. Of course it was not, because it was not relevant to the reference of that Commission. The whole object of that Commission was to find how far it was possible to supply the labour needs of the Transvaal from South Africa and Central Africa. The hon. Member complained that the white population of South Africa were coming back to this country, shipload after shipload. That was the Government case, for their object in introducing Chinese labour was to keep the white population in South Africa. The scheme suggested by the Government had been devised to remedy this. The most startling of all the criticisms which had been made was the attack made upon the regulations which allowed materials for religious idols to be sent to the proposed Chinese coolies in South Africa. Do they mean that the Chinese who valued so much their religious observances should not be allowed to worship in their own way in South Africa ? Surely it was one of the first principles of the British Empire to give ample facilities to every creed and to every race which existed under the wing of that Empire.

He was not concerned about defending millionaires, but if they were dealing with finance relating to South Africa, let them approach the question in a much larger sense. He would remind the House that the amount of money the millionaires in South Africa might get, was only a very small fraction of the money which the development of the Transvaal would distribute all over the world. The central gold supply of the world lay in South Africa, and consequently not only was the commerce and prosperity of South Africa concerned, but the prosperity of the whole world depended to a considerable extent on the steady supply of that precious metal. If this industry was not developed, not only would the millionaires suffer, but also the shareholders, as well as the labouring population. He believed there were about 100,000 shareholders averaging about £87. If they considered the number of companies waiting to be developed they could gauge the limitation which was now being placed upon our prosperity in South Africa, and thoughout the world, by this stagnation of the mining trade. This was a much larger question than that which concerned only financiers and bankers, for it embraced the larger basis of the gold supply of the world. He did not intend to traverse all the ground which had been gone over by the Secretary for the Colonies, for nobody could have more exhaustively covered the general aspect of the question than he did. There was always prejudice against millionaires and against men who had made vast fortunes in a short time. There was always a prejudice against millionaires and foreign shareholders, and there was a very natural prejudice which confused the gamble of the Stock Exchange, which it justly condemned, with the essential interests of a great colony. Then there was the sentiment they had heard so much about to-night in regard to Lord Milner, the Colonial Secretary, and every official and mine-owner in South Africa, who were accused of trying to induce this country to become slave-dealers and do a manifest injustice, in order that some men might pursue their lust for gold. The sentiment consisted of two varieties. First there was the sentiment which attributed to Lord Milner, the Transvaal Government, and the Colonial Secretary that they were avaricious stock jobbers, and in reality nothing more than organised slave-dealers, seeking to force upon a reluctant white people an equally reluctant body of indentured slaves, and that slavery which was the ruin of nations. The second variety of sentiment was that which objected to Chinese simply because they were Chinese, and must be the undoing of any State except their own. Such sentiments from papers, speeches, and conversations seemed not infrequent. His object was to try to clear away all sentiment and prejudice and to get at the heart of the matter. He would try to show that the real issue was not only one which concerned the future of the black man or the white man, but that it involved not only the future prosperity of the Transvaal but of all South Africa, of England, and even more closely the future of the British Empire as well. He wanted to show that this question was not only one of industrial and economic importance, but it was also of vast political, moral, and Imperial importance.

The shortage of labour in South Africa was universally admitted, and it was no new question. In the year 1835 the Dutch settlers in Cape Colony themselves were compelled by the shortage of labour to introduce Malays from their Eastern possessions, and to this they owed the variegated and picturesque Malay population of the Cape Peninsula to-day. Natal was compelled to introduce nearly 100,000 Indian coolies to work their mines, simply because she was not able to find a sufficient supply of labour amongst her own inhabitants. In Cape Colony within the last twelve years two committees had been formed by the Cape Colony Government to consider this question, and to look for some source of labour supply outside the Colony. The last committee sat in 1893, and indeed far earlier than that the Cape Colony had petitioned unanimously in favour of the introduction of Chinese labour, and a recommendation to this effect was unanimously passed by the Cape Assembly. Finally, at Bloemfontein in March, 1903, there was held a Conference of the chosen representatives of all the British Colonies in South Africa, and they passed unanimously the following resolution—

> "That this conference, after considering all available statistics, and hearing the reports of the highest official authorities of the several States, has come to the conclusion that the native population of Africa south of the Zambesi does not comprise a sufficient number of adult males capable of work to satisfy the normal rements of the several Colonies, and at the same time furnish an adequate amount of labour for the large industrial and mining centres. Under these circumstances it is evident to the conference that the opening of new sources of labour supply is requisite in the interests of all the South African States."

The greatest authorities in South Africa upon the labour question were present at that conference, and the result was that the whole conference found, after due consideration, that there was not sufficient labour for the normal requirements of the white people of South Africa. But, Sir, those who were not present at the Bloemfontein Conference appeared to be not satisfied with the result of their deliberation. They said that the members of the conference were prejudiced, and that the information put before them was not sufficient in detail, or sufficiently correct, to warrant their arriving at this decision; and then it was that representatives in the Transvaal of all classes of opinion went to the High Commissioner and begged him to appoint a Commission for thoroughly investigating the labour question.

in order that the world might know once and for all if there really was sufficient labour in South Africa for the requirements of the Transvaal. The Commission commenced its sittings on the 3rd of July last for the purposes of making inquiries as to—

> "What amount of labour is necessary for the requirements of the agricultural, mining, and other industries of the Transvaal, and to ascertain how far it is possible to obtain an adequate supply of labour to meet such requirements from Central and Southern Africa."

There were two Reports made by that Commission. Out of the twelve Commissioners ten drew up a Report which was known as the Majority Report, and two drew up a second Report which was known as the Minority Report. The Minority Commission Report was signed only by two members out of the twelve, and they appeared to be the only two gentlemen in the Transvaal, of approved authority, who opposed the present proposal. The new Majority Report laid down four conclusions—

(1) That the demand for native labour for agriculture in the Transvaal is largely in excess of the present supply, and, as the development of the country proceeds, this demand will greatly increase.

(2) That the demand for native labour for the Transvaal mining industry is in excess of the present supply by about 129,000 labourers; and, whilst no complete data of the future requirements of the whole industry are obtainable, it is estimated that the mines of the Witwatersrand alone will require, within the next five years, an additional supply of 196,000 labourers.

(3) That the demand for native labour for other industries, including railways, is greatly in excess of the present supply, and will increase concurrently with the advancement of mining and agriculture.

(4) That there is no adequate supply of labour in Central and Southern Africa to meet the above requirements.

He would deal with the Minority Report later on. They might take it for granted that at least there existed at present an immense shortage of labour in South Africa, despite the important, desperate, and almost grotesque attempts to obtain it. Take the case of mines alone as the central industry. Native labour alone in 1899 totalled 112,000 as compared with 68,000 to-day. The case of the mines was only one out of many industries, raising this cry for labour, but it was the most urgent. It had been made a reproach that this clamour for labour was confined only to the mine-owners. It had also been said that commerce and agriculture were to be sacrificed in South Africa to the greed of millionaires. The evidence, showed that every interest, every trade, whether of companies or individuals, raised exactly the same demand for more unskilled labour. Unskilled labour was the basis of every industrial trade in the world. This was not in the least a mine-owners' grievance, and South Africa called for labour as a whole. The mines said that the railways had too much, and agriculture said that the mines and railways were ruining them. Commerce declared that it was hopelessly handicapped by the want of labour. The same cry went up all round. On page 92 of the last Blue-book would be found the claims of commerce, from the representative of the Chamber of Commerce; on page 149, that "farmer, grower, servant, everybody," depended on mineral development; on page 106 the bitter complaint of the railways of shortage of labour and of the impossibility of construction; on page 179 the statement of the Chamber of Trade making the same demand; and finally, on page 116, there were chemists, metallurgists, miners, engineers, geologists, doctors, pharmaceutists, architects, accountants, auditors, electricians, surveyors, and even dentists joining in the same demand for a supply of outside labour. In the face of that evidence of a simultaneous cry for the same thing, it was surely idle to suggest, except on the assumption that everybody was a hireling of the mines, that it was only in the interests of the millionaire mine-owners that this increase of labour was demanded. By a majority of ten to two the Commission came to the conclusion that much more labour was needed.

But it had been asked: "What has been done to find this labour?" Everything had been done and large expenditure incurred in the endeavour to discover new sources of African labour to meet the demand in the Transvaal.

*Major SEELY: Except the raising of wages.

Mr. CUST admitted that wages by a great mistake had been lowered, but they had since been raised to their former level, and in many cases beyond, but the rate of living had increased. Every part of Africa had been ransacked to supply labour to the Transvaal and the British colonies. The mine-owners had gone, not only to every British colony, but also to every German colony, to German East Africa, to German West Africa, Egypt, Congo, Madagascar, Abyssinia, and Somaliland; an enormous amount of money has been spent in the endeavour to get a supply of labour; but in each case the answer was the same, "We cannot spare any labour; we want more ourselves." It had been suggested that the whole of these efforts were a blind and a pretence, that they were merely a means by which the Transvaal millionaire might the more easily slide in the servile labour he desired. Against that imputation of bad faith on the part of the Labour Association, there was the unimpeachable word of Sir Godfrey Lagden, the head of the Native Department, than whom no one knew the native territory better, and than whom no one had rendered better service to the natives of South Africa. Sir Godfrey Lagden had stated that he and his Department were perfectly cognisant of the work of the Labour Association, that they had followed it closely, that they believed it to be genuine, thorough, and unintermittent, and that the agents employed by the Association were perfectly suitable for their work. As a possible means of forcing African labour into the service of the Transvaal, it had been suggested that a certain amount of compulsion, direct or indirect, should be used. Which would the Opposition prefer—compulsion such as the Boers exercised in the old days, or Chinese labour? Then there was the suggestion of a change in the tribal system, and, thirdly, a change of native land tenure. Who, remembering what had happened in the last sixty years with reference to the tribal system and native land tenure, remembering the enormous upset and the enormous risk which those who dared to attempt to interfere with the most intimate traditional rights of the natives would run, would suggest that any Government would not rather face the possible inconveniences of Asiatic labour than the complete overturn of a country where our nominal servants were in the proportion of ten to one of their masters? As to the Minority Report, it read not so much as a Report on the evidence itself as a hostile criticism of the Majority Report. It took the Majority Report and dealt with it, ignoring, except in one or two favourable instances, the evidence brought before the Commission. Its main points were denied by every other authority. The framers of that Report seemed to deny that there was any hurry, or any need for immediate action, and to suppose that the ideal of 1899, before the war, was quite sufficient to aim at. They combined an unbased but most sanguine optimism as to the future of the Transvaal with an entirely unbased suspicion of the evidence with which they did not agree. Moreover one of the two members who signed it—Mr. Quin—only six months ago was a member of an important deputation to the Government, which desired, as labour was so short, that all railway construction should be put off until a further supply had been obtained.

The result of the shortage of labour had been absolute stagnation in every field of development by which the Transvaal might be made a rich, solvent, and self-supporting State. According to his belief, any further efficient supply of black labour was unattainable. What then were the alternatives? First of all, by far the best alternative would be British white labour if it could be obtained. No one would deny that if they could get prosperous and self-respecting white British labour for the remunerative and the less remunerative parts of Transvaal work all would be satisfied. It was argued that we had done it in Australia, and that it had been done in America. That was perfectly true, but there were two things to be remembered. One was that in America and in Australia they had practically no black population to deal with. The other point was that the ores they were working yielded three, four, or five times as much as the ores obtained in the Transvaal, and consequently there was that enormous margin to spend on wages. Two experiments in white labour had been tried already in South Africa, one indirectly through the mines, and the other directly through Government employment in the construction of railways. No doubt they were well-intentioned, but they were profoundly unsuccessful. Extracts might be read from various reports of committees of both mine managers and engineers showing the history and the results of those experiments. The details and the figures showed that they were economically impossible and socially most undesirable. Considering the loud cries of earnestness hon. Members opposite had emitted, he thought it was their duty to read very carefully the particulars given in the Blue-book before they made up their minds as to the employment of white labour in South Africa. On this question of the employment of white labour in South Africa, nobody, unless he believed that Lord Milner and every other official, from the highest to the lowest grade, all the experts and the mine-owners, were knaves and liars, could doubt the cumulative evidence embodied in the Blue-book to the effect that British white labour was impossible. And surely the reason was not far to seek. A white man would never work at the same task as the black man. The situation in South Africa was a totally new one in the history of modern civilisation. It was the case of white man's country and white man's climate, where white men could live and breed, but with an enormous and overwhelming preponderance of free black men who would not work. In the Southern States of America the black population were wholly bond and slave. In Australia and in Western America, during the period of development, the coloured races of both continents were practically non-existent. Both were white man's countries, and in both white worked by the side of white in the highest and the lowest labour. India was not a white man's country, so the question did not there arise. But in South Africa it arose in fierce and fearful reality, and it was upon the treatment of that question that the whole future of South Africa depended.

But the question was asked—If they could not get British white labour why not try white labour from other countries? Let the House consider the results of such an importation. In Natal they had the Indian coolie. Indian coolies could be, to some extent, controlled though their number, their status as British subjects, and their trading capacities and commercial freedom had proved of infinite difficulty in Natal. But in Natal it was laid down that no British subject could have any political privilege in the country to which he had emigrated higher than that which he enjoyed in the country from which he came. But over other white men we should have no control whatever. If they imported 100,000 Hungarians, Bohemians, or what not, they would get them cheap, but they would get them nasty. They would set up a lower standard of living and a lower standard of life, and the British emigrant would be exposed to a competition from which he could not be protected, and which would ultimately ruin him. They could not prevent the white man or quasi-white man getting the franchise, or competing with the British white labourer or white tradesman in every possible way, or lowering the standard of living and the standard of life. It was this class who introduced corruption into the politics of New York, first into the municipal and then into the national Legislature, and finally by a vagrant and easily purchased vote obtained control of the national Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, who was not a calumniator of America, speaking of the "poor white trash" introduced into America by this system had said—

> "Shiftless, ignorant, improvident, with no aims in the present nor hope for the future, citizens in nothing but the possession of votes, they were a standing reproach to the system that produced them, and the most convincing proof of its economic as well as its moral failure."

Surely the introduction of Chinese labour contains less danger than the infinite national evil suggested by that sentence. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen had disposed of the theory that all labour in the Transvaal could be put into the hands of white men. As to wages in the years 1902–3 the total wages fund in the Transvaal in salaries and wages amounted to £4,700,000. Out of this total the whites received, roughly speaking, £3,500,000, and the blacks £1,250,000; that was to say, the whites received some 70 per cent. of the total wages paid to the workers in the mineral works of the Transvaal.

Mr. MARKHAM was understood to say that the correct percentage was only thirty for white labour.

Mr. CUST believed his figures were correct. The facts being as he had stated, what alternative was there but that of the introduction of Chinese? That was the only thing left. One objection to the Chinaman was that he was a Chinaman. That, of course, he could not help, and he believed one of the first principles of Liberalism and even of humanity was that no man should be penalised for congenitial defects. It was admitted that he helped to build up California; he undoubtedly did a great deal of pioneering in Australia; and in countries like Borneo, Singapore, and elsewhere, he was found to be invaluable as a servant and labourer. As to the treatment of the Chinese they would be entirely protected in China; they would enlist there; they would go freely; they would know where they were going; they would take their wives and families; and at the end of their time they would be repatriated. As to the Englishmen, the British Consul would be on the spot, and cases of excess or of pressure beyond legitimate limits, would be reported by him to the proper authorities. The opposition to the proposal came largely from prejudice and sentiment. At this time of day, after we had gone through the late war for the sake of South Africa, it was absurd that prejudice and sentiment, and, he ventured to say, cant, should be allowed to stand in the way of a great economical and Imperial necessity.

What other opposition was there? There was the opposition of Cape Colony. Cape Colony was in the throes of a general election, and it was always difficult to guage the real opinion of a community at such a time. But on two occasions, years ago, Cape Colonists themselves petitioned for the importation of Chinese labour. There was then only the opposition of Australia and New Zealand. We valued our colonies, but it was somewhat absurd that New Zealand, with a population about equal to that of a provincial town in England, should dictate the policy of the Empire in this matter. As to the change of opinion in South Africa, if hon. Members would only read the despatches, addresses, petitions, and the debates in the Legislative Council, they would be able to judge for themselves whether there was not such a thing as a bonâ fide opinion even in South Africa. Lord Milner saw the danger. He had changed his opinion because he knew the real state of things and the impending disaster; he had laid himself open to the charge of inconsistency in order to support what he believed to be the only salvation of the country. If there was any one lesson writ large in our colonial history, written in blood and tears, it was the awful danger of interference with the men on the spot, the men who wanted, the men who knew. In hardly any case of interference by the home Government had the results been satisfactory. Nowhere had that lesson been learnt with greater fulness or bitterness and sorrow than in South Africa. From the days of Somerset to the days of Bartle Frere the finger of Downing Street had been a curse on the land. Left to Sir Bartle Frere there might have been no retrocession of the Transvaal, no Majuba, none of the weariness of the flesh and the friction between Dutch and English, no Transvaal War, and there might not have been the anxiety and distress of to-day. Both Parties had been equally to blame. He asked the House and all who valued our colonial future to see that Downing Street to-day did not interfere with the wishes of the Colonies. Downing Street used to be a by-word; she was so no longer, and she now asked the House to give its assent to the wishes of the Transvaal Colony. Therefore, it was not only on economic, social, and national grounds, but also on the larger ground of Imperial policy that he respectfully urged the House to reject this Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said he proposed to follow the example of the Colonial Secretary and lay a few general considerations before the House. We commenced the late war in South Africa and carried it on with the object of enfranchising certain persons, and of enabling Englishmen to live under the franchise and liberty in the Transvaal. Were they doing that at the present moment? They had heard a great deal in the recent debate about the iniquities of dumping. But what were they doing at present in the Transvaal? Dumping down Chinese. They had been told that they ought to listen to the voice of the Colonies—that the unity of the Empire depended on this. Well, Cape Colony, Australia, and New Zealand had protested against the action of His Majesty's Government in this matter, and in the Cape Colony the protest had been so strong that, although the two political parties had been divided by a bitter feud, each at the recent General Election tried to obtain support by declaring against the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa. The right hon. Gentleman had naturally based his defence on financial grounds; he had said that the Transvaal would assuredly be ruined unless workers could be obtained for the mines. It did not signify how or where they were obtained, but the main object was to secure them. Already some pressure had been used upon the South African natives to induce them to work in the mines, and now it was sought to get forced labour from China. Everybody knew that where slavery was adopted in mines the mine-owners gained. Years ago it was adopted in the Spanish Colonies and the mine-owner gained although the Colonies might not have benefited. Asiatic labour was forbidden in Australia, and in the United States and Canada the feeling was strongly against it. Yet the mine-owners were seeking to get this labour in the Transvaal mines. They pleaded that they could not get native labour, but was it not likely that they themselves created the difficulty in regard to labour in South Africa, because they wanted power to pay what wages they pleased? They were not particularly scrupulous. They got up a revolution because they said they were helots, and since then they had been endeavouring to obtain permission to employ forced labour. Before the war took place in 1897, because there were so many native boys unable to obtain employment, wages were reduced 30 per cent., and it was noteworthy that in Mr. Fitzpatrick's "Official Defence of the War" it was declared that the aim of the war was to reduce wages, and that the effect in the Transvaal would be a saving of £650,000 in the annual wage bill. The only object of the mine-owners from the first had been to reduce the wages bill. They tried to cut down the rates before the war, and again as soon as the war was over. That was what the war was for.

Mr. MALCOLM (Suffolk, Stowmarket) said that in June, 1899, the Boer Government by proclamation reduced the native wages.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said that in that instance the Boer Government unfortunately yielded to the importunity of the mine-owners. No doubt they thought the mine-owners were supported by public opinion in this country and that therefore it would be wiser to yield that point. The late Colonial Secretary invented a scheme by which he thought he would be able to drive the natives into the mines by pointing out to them the advantages of polygamy. An extra wife was added as a bait, but he said they would have to pay £2 per annum for her. He himself was happy to say that that scheme did not succeed. The next thing they found was that convicts were employed on the mines, but they were not sent underground; and it was now reserved for this House to oblige the Transvaal mine-owners by providing them with Chinese labour for underground work. The right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary went out of his way to praise the mine-owners. He would not go out of his way to abuse them; but it was extraordinary that the right hon. Gentleman should have praised them when it was well-known their only object was to make millions out of poor men. About 12,000,000 persons must have been induced to gamble in South African mining shares, and the eminent gentlemen whom the right hon. Gentleman delighted to honour were in the fullest sense of the word promoters of mining companies, some of which might pay, but the majority of which would not pay. What they wanted was to humbug fools into buying their shares. No doubt the introduction of Chinese labour would benefit the mine-owners and would also benefit the 12,000,000 gamblers who were induced to gamble in mining shares. He should like to know how many of those gamblers were in the House. It had been decided with regard to public houses that a magistrate who was interested could not vote; and he wondered, if gentlemen who were interested in South African mines were excluded from voting on the Amendment, whether the majority would be in favour of this scheme of slavery in South Africa. He did no think that the scheme would be any benefit to the Transvaal. The object of persons who kept shops was to get customers, and where there was a large population of working men there would also be a large number of shops. But the Chinese would not be allowed to go to the shops in the Transvaal, and they would eat nothing but rice, which would be imported from their native land. The mine-owners, the friends of the right hon. Gentleman, made no secret as to what their object was. They said their object was political, and that they were afraid of trades unions and men who had votes. They were, therefore, trying to build up a great British possession with a working population of slaves. He said there was no place in the British Empire for such a colony. The right hon. Gentleman talked about the £35,000,000 loan, but he should like to know whether there was any bargain between the late Colonial Secretary and the mine-owners with regard to that loan. It was true the mine-owners undertook to underwrite £10,000,000 of it, but they shirked out of that. He would like to know if there was any bargain with the mine-owners with regard to foreign labour in South Africa. He confessed it looked as if there had been. If this scheme was not slavery, what was slavery? If it was not slavery, it was only not slavery very much in the same sense as the Government was not a protectionist Government. The Chinaman would be taken away from China and would have to spend three years in servitude. If he quitted his location and was found walking about as any free man might, he would be arrested, and if he did not work he would be punished with six months' hard labour. When his children were sixteen years of age, unless they consented to enter into the same servitude, they would be sent back to China. He asked—Was not that slavery?

Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman said that the Chinaman was to be allowed to take as many wives with him as he pleased. What would be the position of those wives and their numerous families? The real truth was that there was no pretence that this was not slavery. Lord Onslow said that the Chinese would be taken from China and put into loose boxes. Was that a proper way to talk about human beings? He was glad to say that such language had shocked a great many bishops, with whom he was not always absolutely in accord. Some of them protested in the name of humanity against the monstrous proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. It was a disgrace to China to agree to this proposal, and it was a disgrace to this country, which fancied itself to be a civilised nation, to try and force it on the Chinese. In 1855, when Peru contracted with the Chinese Government for the export of coolies, a very different Government from the present Government, the Liberal Government of the day, stepped in and protested in the name of humanity against Peru doing what it was proposed that this country should now do. The Colonial Secretary said that it was monstrous to attack the Legislative Assembly of the Transvaal. The right hon. Gentleman said he would not dare to look Africa in the face. He himself did not know what that meant; but the Legislative Council consisted of nominated men. He would as soon think of producing the House of Lords as the best Assembly in this country as of assigning to the Legislative Council that position in South Africa. The right hon. Gentleman went out of his way to insult General Botha, General Delarey, and others who were honoured and respected not only by the Boers but by many men in this country. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that that was the best way to gain over the Boers to his cause, or calm feeling between the two races in South Africa? The right hon. Gentleman abused General Botha because he wrote to him stating that the Boers were against this proposal; and the right hon. Gentleman said of that gallant foe that he did not believe him and that he would not be tricked by such a paltry device. He protested against this iniquity which was contemplated by the Government; and he thought it was very unfair that they had not been given an opportunity of discussing the question except on the debate on the Address. In the debate on the last Amendment one Minister said he would vote for a great fiscal change because the Prime Minister was absent; another Minister said he would vote for it because Russia was at war with Japan. He asked hon. Gentlemen not to have any confidence in such Ministers. Their ability might be great, but it was latent; and their policy might be excellent, but no one knew what it was. He asked every hon. Gentleman to remember that every vote given against the Amendment would be a vote in favour of slavery and against democracy and freedom and the working men of England. The course of the Government was nearly run. The day of judgment was yawning for them, when they would have to account to the country; and he could assure Ministers that if the Liberals got a majority at the next election, the very first thing they would do would be to reverse this policy, which was a disgrace and a dishonour to the country.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Malcolm)—put, and agreed to.
